There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be considered to have been read the second time at length.

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing a resolution to designate the week of February 10, 1985 through February 16, 1985 as "National DECA Week." DECA, the acronym for Distributive Education Clubs of America, is a student-centered organization with a program of leadership and personal development designed specifically for secondary and postsecondary students with career objectives in the marketing field.

In describing the state of American education in its much publicized report, the National Commission on Excellence in Education stated: "Our Nation is at risk. Our once unchallenged preeminence in commerce, industry, science, and technological innovation is being overtaken by competitors throughout the world." The report follows up this gloomy prognosis with a mandate for action to strengthen America's educational system and ensure our Nation's continued leadership role in world affairs.

Mr. President, I believe that the Distributive Education Clubs of America have been following this mandate since their beginning. The qualities that are encouraged by DECA—vocational understanding, civic consciousness, social intelligence, and leadership development—parallel those that the Commission's report indicates are needed in our Nation. With a national membership of over 150,000 in the 50 States, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico, DECA is making an indispensable contribution to the improvement of our educational system and, in the long run, to the growth and prosperity of our Nation.

Through professional conferences, chapter activities, school improvement projects, and support of community activities, DECA strives to ensure that America will continue to have productive entrepreneurs and business persons in community leadership positions. That's the foundation of the type of free enterprise that has kept America strong.

The American work force, however, is undergoing a dramatic change. The American Productivity Center predicts that, by 1995, fully 90 percent of the Nation's jobs will be white collar jobs. Even today, at a corporation like Westinghouse, a manufacturing company by tradition, about one-third of the total sales are generated by service businesses. As America tries to manage and adapt to these changes, DECA will be an increasingly significant source of leadership.

The intellectual and productive potential of America's youth is enormous, and no one is more aware of that fact than those affiliated with DECA. The fine work done by DECA with thousands of young people throughout the country richly deserves this special recognition. I am very pleased to be offering this resolution, and would like to thank those Senators who have given this measure such tremendous support through their original cosponsorship. In addition, I especially would like to thank the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator THURMOND, for his assistance in expediting consideration of this measure.●

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, all parents strive to nurture certain qualities in their children, setting forth such examples as integrity and social consciousness. While the foundation for these attributes remains in the home, we also look to teachers, administrators, and school programs and activities to reinforce these positive messages. Further, we encourage our children to participate in those clubs and organizations which foster character development and a sense of personal achievement.

The Distributive Education Clubs of America [DECA] have been promoting these values for many years. DECA was organized specifically for secondary and postsecondary students contemplating careers in the marketing field. With a national membership of over 150,000, DECA emphasizes vocational awareness, social intelligence, civic-mindedness, and leadership development.

I am very proud of my State's leadership role in DECA history. When the Distributive Education Clubs of America were first organized in 1947, an Arkansas chapter was among the charter group. Today, there are 50 Arkansas DECA chapters, with 2,000 student members.

The indispensable contributions made by the Distributive Education Clubs throughout the country are deserving of special recognition. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN] has introduced a resolution designating the week of February 10 through February 16, 1985 as "National DECA Week." I am pleased to cosponsor this measure, which salutes DECA's 38-year history, and urge all of my colleagues to support this worthwhile resolution.●

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 36) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. J. RES. 36

Whereas members of the Distributive Education Clubs of America are playing an outstanding role in assuring the future progress and prosperity of our Nation;

Whereas it is vital in our complex society that young people are trained in the field of marketing and distribution to fill the increased demand for such people;

Whereas the members of the Distributive Education Clubs of America, are young secondary and postsecondary students who are preparing for careers in marketing and distribution, and the intense interest shown by such members is an assurance that the business world will grow and improve; and

Whereas marketing and distributive education has provided the valuable service of developing leadership, encouraging cooperation, promoting good citizenship, teaching current information, and inspiring patriotism among its members: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of February 10, 1985, through February 16, 1985, is designated as "National DECA Week" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

COMMENDING PATRICK J. GRIFFIN FOR HIS FAITHFUL AND EXEMPLARY SERVICE TO THE U.S. SENATE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I send a simple resolution to the desk and ask that it be stated by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 60) commending Patrick J. Griffin for his faithful and exemplary service to the U.S. Senate.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed immediately to the consideration of the resolution, it having been cleared by the other side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 60) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 60

Whereas Patrick J. Griffin has faithfully served the Senate as an officer of the Senate, the Senate wishes to express its appreciation for his dedicated service as an officer of the Senate; and

Whereas the said Patrick J. Griffin at all times has discharged the important duties and responsibilities of his office with great efficiency, and diligence; and

Whereas prior to his service as Secretary for the Minority, he served the Senate in other important capacities; and

Whereas his loyalty, his exceptional service and continuing dedication have earned for him esteem and affection, so therefore, be it

Resolved, That Patrick J. Griffin is hereby commended for his faithful and outstanding service to the Senate.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate is directed to transmit a copy of the Resolution to Patrick J. Griffin.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ELECTING DAVID J. PRATT AS SECRETARY FOR THE MINORITY OF THE SENATE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask it be stated by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 61) electing David J. Pratt as Secretary for the Minority of the Senate.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the resolution having been agreed to by the distinguished assistant Republican leader, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 61) was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That David J. Pratt be, and he is hereby, elected Secretary for the Minority of the Senate, effective February 1, 1985.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished acting—assistant Republican leader. He is not just the acting leader; he is the assistant leader.

Mr. SIMPSON. I thank the Senate minority leader.

TRIBUTES TO PATRICK J. GRIFFIN

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I would just like to add a word about Pat Griffin. In my time here he has been most attentive and helpful to me personally and to those of us on this side of the aisle whenever he could do so. I certainly wish him well.

I was pleased to see the very fine reception for him the other evening. I trust that he will enjoy his new work. I wish him Godspeed and thank him for the attentiveness he gave to me in this body.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished assistant Republican leader for the remarks he has made with respect to Mr. Griffin's service here to Senators on both sides of the aisle. It is very good of the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, the majority whip, to speak in this way concerning Pat Griffin.

Pat Griffin has proved his ability and his dedication to the difficult task that was assigned to him 2 years ago. He leaves this post with the admiration and the good wishes of Senators on both sides of the aisle. He leaves a great number of friends here behind him in both the majority and minority parties.

I join with all my colleagues, I am sure, in wishing Pat Griffin the very best and hoping that we will continue to see him from time to time. He has fought a good fight, he has kept the faith, and he has finished the course.

WELCOME TO DAVID J. PRATT

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, as we await further resolution, I reflect that those on both sides of the aisle who serve as senior staff go on to bigger and better things and we often do see them again—in fact, often too often—as they go into the private sector. I think the minority leader might agree that that does happen and indeed it should with skilled persons such as that.

I welcome, too, David J. Pratt, whom I have not come to know. I will enjoy working with him in his new role effective tomorrow.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority whip. I am sure that Mr. Pratt, as well as Mr. Griffin, will be deeply grateful for the kind remarks that have been made on the majority side of the aisle.

I am sure that David Pratt will perform as expected. He has the ability, dedication to purpose, devotion, and the love for the Senate that I think are required to do a high-quality performance in the job as secretary to the minority.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPOINTMENT OF SENATOR WEICKER TO THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF THE JOHN F. KENNEDY CENTER FOR THE PERFORMING ARTS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair on behalf of the Vice President appoints the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WEICKER] to the Board of Trustees of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, vice the former Senator from Illinois Mr. Percy, pursuant to Public Law 85-874.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M., MONDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1985

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move in accordance with the previous order that the Senate stand in recess until 10 a.m., Monday, February 4, 1985.

The motion was agreed to; and, at 4:13 p.m., the Senate recessed until Monday, February 4, 1985, at 10 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

LESSON TO BE LEARNED FROM FALLEN POLICE HERO

HON. MARIO BIAGGI
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as a 23-year police veteran, I am deeply saddened by the recent shooting death of D.C. Police Sgt. Joseph M. Cournoyer. I want to pay a richly deserved tribute to this fallen hero and I want to extend my condolences to his family.

History tells us that over the last 10 years some 1,600 law enforcement officers have been killed in the line of duty. Like so many of those courageous men and women, Sergeant Cournoyer was shot and killed while confronting an armed felon. The news accounts tell us that Sergeant Cournoyer, who was 30 years old and a 6-year veteran of the D.C. Police Force, was shot through the heart at close range during the arrest of a robbery suspect.

Other facts stand out when we learn about Sergeant Cournoyer's tragic death. For example, we know that it was only a matter of moments between the time of the robbery and when Sergeant Cournoyer located a suspect aboard a nearby shuttle bus. We also are told Sergeant Cournoyer did not draw his service revolver when he boarded that bus because he was concerned for the safety of innocent passengers. Thus, we know that Sergeant Cournoyer acted both quickly, courageously and responsibly. We can ask nothing more of our police officers. Unfortunately, while that type of police work provides a maximum level of safety for the public it does not always ensure a police officer's safety.

There is also one other fact associated with Sergeant Cournoyer's death that cannot be overlooked. Although all D.C. police officers have recently been furnished with bullet resistant vests purchased by funds raised largely from the community, Sergeant Cournoyer was not wearing his vest when he was shot. We can only speculate why Sergeant Cournoyer was not wearing his vest. Some police officers have complained that the bullet resistant vests are uncomfortable to wear. But, that does not seem to be the case with Sergeant Cournoyer since reports indicate he usually did wear his vest. What we do know, though, is that there is a very good chance Sergeant Cournoyer would be alive today if he had been wearing his vest. It would have covered his chest area and we know that the vest D.C. police officers wear stops most conventional handgun ammunition.

In fact, bullet resistant vests have been credited with saving more than 400 police lives since they first started being used around 1974. Reports indicate that more than half of our Nation's 570,000 law enforcement officers have been issued protective vests. Unfortunately, we cannot be certain that those officers actually wear their vests on a day-to-day basis.

As one D.C. police official was quoted as saying, "Everybody is aware of the dangers of the job, and the trouble is it gets to be routine. Something like this snaps everybody back into the real world."

Ultimately, it is up to each police officer as to whether or not they wear their vest. However, we all have a responsibility to see that police officers across the country have a vest to wear. That is why I joined so many others in the D.C. area in seeing to it that enough money was raised to purchase vests for each of the approximately 3,000 D.C. police officers who patrol our streets. We can all be proud of the successful nature of that effort, and be hopeful that more police officers will realize the need to wear those vests.

We can also do something more to better protect our police officers. We can ban the armor-piercing handgun ammunition that can penetrate bullet resistant vests. For nearly 6 years, I have proposed legislation aimed at eliminating these awesome projectiles that cannot be stopped by even the best of the soft body armor worn by police. Significantly, these so-called cop killer bullets are not used for any sporting or other legitimate purpose. Only one element of our society stands to benefit from the continued availability of these bullets—the criminal element. This situation must not be allowed to continue and my bill, H.R. 4, would put an end to it by banning the manufacture, importation and sale of armor-piercing ammunition. I am confident that enactment of this important legislation is very close at hand.

Mr. Speaker, last year I was proud to have authored a law allowing a National Law Enforcement Heroes Memorial to be built in Washington, DC. This memorial will provide a well deserved and long overdue tribute to the Federal, State and local law enforcement officers who die in the line of duty. Sergeant Cournoyer will be honored by that memorial.

Clearly, a memorial to those courageous individuals, like Sergeant Cournoyer, who sacrifice their lives while protecting others is something good. But, while we work to memorialize police deaths, let's also work to prevent them.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert an article discussing Sergeant Cournoyer's death, which appeared in today's Washington Post:

MANHUNT FAILS TO NET KILLER OF D.C. OFFICER

(By John Ward Anderson and Alfred E. Lewis)

Scores of D.C. police officers, some equipped with flak jackets and armed with shotguns, combed through a 40-block section of far Northeast Washington yesterday but failed in their effort to capture the gunman who fatally shot a District police sergeant Tuesday night.

While squads of heavily armed officers and dog handlers searched a number of buildings in response to telephoned tips, others went door to door circulating fliers and interviewing neighborhood residents.

"In the history of this department, there has never been a person who killed a police officer who hasn't been arrested," Assistant Chief Isaac Fulwood Jr. said of the vast manhunt. "We think we have a lead, but that's all I can say at this point. We do not have a suspect," he said at a late afternoon news conference.

"This really hits close to home," another police official said yesterday. "Everybody is aware of the dangers of the job, and the trouble is it gets to be routine. Something like this snaps everybody back into the real world. . . ."

Fulwood yesterday released a composite drawing and description of the man who shot and killed 6th District Sgt. Joseph M. Cournoyer, 30, a six-year veteran of the force, at a bus stop outside the Minnesota Avenue Metrorail station about 7:45 p.m. Tuesday. Fulwood also announced that a $7,500 reward would be paid for information leading to the gunman's arrest and conviction.

Police said that moments before the shooting the gunman and an accomplice robbed a Murray's Steaks store less than a block from the Metro station. Cournoyer, who was in uniform and alone in a marked police cruiser, apparently heard a radio report of the robbery, went to the Metro station and boarded a waiting neighborhood shuttle bus to look for suspects, police said.

They said about 10 persons and the driver were on the bus, and that Cournoyer spotted a passenger who fit the description of one of the holdup men and asked him to stand.

Cournoyer did a "preliminary frisk" of the man, Fulwood said, and ordered him to the front of the bus and outside onto the platform. There, a fight broke out during which the man pulled a handgun from his jacket and shot Cournoyer once in the chest, Fulwood said.

He was taken to Prince George's General Hospital—the closest to the shooting scene—where he was pronounced dead about an hour later. An autopsy yesterday revealed that the bullet pierced Cournoyer's heart.

Cournoyer, who was not wearing the bulletproof vest he had been issued, apparently didn't draw his service revolver while on the bus because of concern for the passengers' safety, Fulwood said. He said that, while the investigation is under way, he was "not privileged to say what happened to the second man" involved in the holdup, and whether that man was on the bus at the time of the shooting or how he made his escape.

According to one police official, the department had received a large number of calls from people offering information, but that so far none had led them any closer to a suspect. The most dramatic moment of the search came about 5:30 p.m. yesterday when riot gear-equipped police surrounded an apartment building at 3693 Jay St. NE after an anonymous caller said one of the holdup men was inside. Police conducted a room-to-room search of the building but found nothing, officials said.

Officers throughout the department wore strips of black tape over their badges yesterday in public mourning for Cournoyer, who lived in Riverdale with his wife, Darlene.

Cournoyer, who was promoted to sergeant six months ago, was the 33rd D.C. officer to die in the line of duty since 1963. Twenty-two of those died of gunshot wounds. The last two D.C. officers slain on duty were Robert K. Best, who was killed in December 1982 in a fight with a gunman on Suitland Parkway, and Donald G. Luning, who was killed in September 1982, in a struggle with a stolen-car suspect five blocks from where Cournoyer was slain Tuesday. Both Best and Luning were shot to death, and neither was wearing a bulletproof vest.

Their deaths sparked a massive campaign that ultimately raised $634,000 to buy bulletproof vests for all D.C. police officers, and law enforcement officials said yesterday that Cournoyer's death was a grim reminder of the protective value of those vests.

"From what I hear, [Cournoyer] wore his vest all the time," said Sgt. Robert Hanbury of the 1st District, where Cournoyer was previously assigned. "He was a quiet individual and he was always standing erect, always sharp, shoes shined and neat as a pin. Of all the people not to have it on . . . ."

A police spokesman said that the department has issued about 3,000 vests to members of the department—nearly everyone from the rank of sergeant down in the field operations division, which conducts routine street patrol.

Wearing the vests has not been made mandatory, he said, because of the large number of complaints made by rank-and-file officers that the vests are often uncomfortable.

Gary Hankins, spokesman for the Fraternal Order of Police, said yesterday that "the same quality that keeps bullets out keeps virtually 100 percent of the body heat in."

During the summer months, Hankins said, officers wearing the vests have had to be treated at the police and fire clinic for body rashes and heat fatigue caused by the vests, which weigh about 3½ lbs. and are constructed of 10 layers of Kevlar, a man-made fiber that, pound for pound, has five times the strength of steel.

Vests worn by D.C. officers are designed to stop a .357 magnum bullet at close range, police said. Federal law enforcement officials said such vests are credited with saving the lives of more than 500 police officers since they were introduced nationwide in 1974. Currently, about 270,000 of the nation's 570,000 police officers have been issued protective vests, authorities said, but there are no figures available on how many are actually used on a day-to-day basis.

Funeral services for Cournoyer will be held at 11 a.m. Saturday at St. Bernard's Catholic Church in Riverdale, with burial to follow at Fort Lincoln Cemetery in Brentwood.

Police investigators asked yesterday that anyone with information about the shooting contact the D.C. police homicide division at 727-4347.●

SOVIET REFUSENIKS

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I recently traveled to the Soviet Union where I was fortunate enough to be able to meet with several refusenik families. The term "refusenik" is self-explanatory. Refuseniks are Soviet citizens who have been refused permission to emigrate from the Soviet Union. For having, in Soviet eyes, the temerity to apply for emigration, they automatically lose their jobs and then in a classic "Catch-22" situation are liable and frequently are charged with being parasites under Soviet law.

This year, in which we are proudly restoring the Statue of Liberty and the Soviet Union is slamming the gates shut on emigration and stepping up persecution of dissidents, provides a sharp portrait of the differences between our freedom loving society and the Soviet tyranny. Meeting with refuseniks brought this even closer home to me. It was both heartwarming and heartrending to meet with them. Heartrending because of the persecution and harassment that they must endure as citizens of a state that heaps only abuse on them. Heartwarming because of the steadfast courage with which they meet their persecution.

Through my membership on the Congressional Coalition on Soviet Jewry, I am fighting to have the Soviet state allow refuseniks to emigrate. With warmer relations developing between the United States and the Soviet Union, I hope that the Soviet Union can be prevailed upon to free its refuseniks.

Though a more temperate climate presently prevails between the United States and the Soviet Union, we cannot flag in our efforts on behalf of refuseniks for fear of jeopardizing further improvement in our relations with the Soviets. One of our main goals should be to help Soviet dissidents through cautious but friendly relations with the Soviet Union. Noted scholar Robert Conquest rightly points out that the "crux" of the divide between the United States and the Soviet Union is their denial that all humans have basic rights. We must and can proudly continue our noble heritage of fighting for freedom.

I urge my colleagues to work on behalf of Soviet refuseniks and all Soviet dissidents and to publicize their opposition to Soviet suppression of human rights. If the Soviet Union is sufficiently embarrassed it will remove the leash it collars its refuseniks with and allow them to live in freedom in the West.●

TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM O. PERRY

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, one of the true pioneers of black business in our Miami community was recently honored by the daughters and brothers of Elkdom and friends throughout our counties.

William O. Perry and I go back a long way. Even then, "he did it his way." And, indeed, it proved to be the best way.

We are all proud of Bill for the kind of man that he is, and has always been. We've all benefited from his personal successes and from his many humanitarian endeavors, and join with Bill's many admirers in the praise and appreciation bestowed on one of our finest citizens.

An article from the Miami Times follows:

ADMIRING FRIENDS ROAST AN ELK

(By Starla Vaughns)

"He did it his way." That was the general consensus of W.O. Perry's roasters.

The Banquet-Roasters held at the Elks Atlas Lodge No. 308 to honor Perry who has been a community activist and businessman in the Black community since 1923.

Over 200 people attended the affair honoring Perry. Many walked to the podium to give words of praise and jest, led by Toastmaster Judge Alcee Hastings.

Hastings, who is also an Elk, said that Perry was a fine example of masculinity and a generous businessman, an organizer and visionary.

After introducing him in such a fine manner, Hastings proceeded to say "His color is often mistaken for the majority race, but he knows he's Black.

Owner of Perry Florist, Perry was elected exhalted ruler of the Atlas Lodge No. 308 in 1937. Within two years, he was crowned King of Exalted Rulers for having the greatest increase in membership of the lodges in the United States.

In 1942, he built the Elks Home, which was referred to as the Elks Rest, to house visiting Brothers and Daughters. In 1942, he was appointed Deputy of the Dade County District, serving for seven years, during which time he organized the Liberty Lodge No. 1052 and the Oversea Lodge No. 1057 of Homestead.

Later, Perry recommended the purchase of a 12-room-two story building at 316 N.W. 16th Terr. He renovated the building to make it comfortable and then, through volunteer service and the financial help of the Brothers and the Daughters of Elkdom, a new building was built at that location.

Elected State President in 1960 of the Florida State Association, Perry made a bid for the Grand Lodge to convene in Florida, and won. He worked during this time of segregation to have his Grand Lodge headquarters at Biscayne Bay Auditorium and won, despite the Jim Crow rules of segregation.

Giving almost 50 years to the benefit and upliftment of Elkdom, Perry earned the title, State President Emeritus, which signifies his services to the organization for which he was honored.

"I have given service all my life to God, family, business and the fraternal orders of Elks and Mason," said Perry. "I have met with obstacles and have not had an easy life, but I kept on going and did it my way."

Perry's secretary, Eloise Johnson gave him a money-covered football in honor of the Superbowl and then proceeded to call her boss a slave driver.

"He's the kind of man that does the job himself," said Johnson. "If he found out you weren't doing the job his way, he would do it himself."

Father Kenneth Major was on hand to roast Perry, saying that when Black people have no place to go to celebrate their wonders, Perry found a place for them.

"Now you can go to Miami Beach if you have the money to spend, but it is not the same as having your own place to go." said Major. "He is an organizer and he believed in Blacks having a place of their own."

The mood of the roast was set from the beginning when the audience shouted out that Perry's middle initial "O", means "old" Perry replied, the "O" stands for "Oh Lord, Oh Lord, help me" said Perry. "I knew if I were to succeed I would need His help. If I have touched someone along this road I know my life would not have been in vain."●

HUNGER—A CONTINUING PROBLEM

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, today I submit for inclusion in the RECORD an outstanding series of recent articles on hunger in America published by the Chicago Tribune. These articles provide an in-depth review of the complex hunger problem—its extent, its causes, the role of Federal programs, and the role of the private sector.

These articles make clear that a serious hunger problem remains in this country, despite recent improvements in the economy. Recent reports from the U.S. Conference of Mayors, the National Association of Counties, and many others, confirm that the need for emergency food assistance remains high, and is still growing, in many areas of the country.

As we begin another year of debate on the budget, particularly in this year of the freeze, it is extremely important that we keep the needs of the most vulnerable Americans in mind. For many, a freeze in benefits would put them further behind in their losing battle against hunger.

MORE AND MORE GOING HUNGRY IN LAND OF PLENTY

(By Barbara Mahany)

In the shadows of its skyscrapers, factories and suburban housing tracts, America, a nation of plenty, is also a nation of want. On the edges of its fruited plains, behind its well-stocked supermarkets, America remains a land where millions cannot always find enough to eat.

Hunger in America: It is not a new condition, but in 1984 it is a paradox. American soils yield enough crops each year to feed the nation twice over, yet one in five of its people, more than 47 million, live near or below the poverty level and hunger or the threat of malnutrition.

And, after a decade that almost brought an end to hunger, the problem has grown worse despite the strongest economic recovery since the end of World War II.

To be sure, hunger in America is not made obvious by scenes of starving children lying on the sidewalks, crying out for food as they do in the streets of the Third World.

Instead, it is a silent gallery of portraits reflecting the slow, subtle damage that undernutrition inflicts on those who can't afford to buy enough food for themselves and their families.

Its faces include the 78-year-old Massachusetts widow who, according to a Harvard University study, subsisted on no more than a bowl of Rice Krispies each day for six months. Or the pregnant mother in Greenwood, Miss., who researchers found had had no milk to drink in six days, whose four children cried for food and whose cupboards were bare.

Also included are the 17,500 Massachusetts schoolchildren whose growth has been stunted by malnutrition, according to the state's Health Department. And the 1 in 38 West Side Chicago babies who die by age 1, often because their mothers nursed them with Kool-Aid or watered-down milk. That is almost three times the national infant mortality rate.

"We're not seeing starvation in America in a sense that one sees it in a country where there is an acute loss of food or a chronic undersupply," said Harvard University's Larry Brown, who headed a team of health professionals that spent 15 months documenting hunger problems in New England. He is now leading a team of 22 physicians, sponsored by the Field Foundation, in the first on-site nationwide hunger survey since 1977.

The absence of visible signs of hunger "takes the dramatic edge off," he continued, "but from a medical standpoint, if we had any (health) problem approaching the numbers of people who are hungry, we'd think we had a severe epidemic. It is, in fact; a crisis."

Two decades ago that was supposed to change. In 1964, when America was still basking in the radiant idealism of the Kennedy era and looking for causes to consider, President Lyndon Johnson declared war on poverty. It was hoped that by creating the Great Society, the kind of poverty and hunger that haunted America during the dust bowl days of the 1930s and continued to exist in rural areas and urban ghettos in the 1960s would be wiped out.

An arsenal of federal food-assistance programs was created in the Food Stamp Act of 1964 and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966. As the programs expanded, so did the spending—in real terms a sixfold increase, from $1 billion in 1969 to $19.2 billion today.

By the late 1970s, hunger was retreating, according to most of those who studied the problem. But the tide was reversed during the recent recession, and hunger persists across America, even with the recovery, say experts such as nutritionist Jean Mayer, president of Tufts University in Boston.

Hunger's renewed presence spurred a storm of controversy last winter after former presidential adviser Edwin Meese dismissed its existence as "a lot of anecdotal stuff." President Reagan's Task Force on Food Assistance conceded that "hunger does persist" in America but maintained that "allegations of rampant hunger simply cannot be documented." Meanwhile, bread lines at churches, missions and emergency shelters continued to grow.

Experts say the re-emergence of hunger was ushered in by the length and serverity of the recent recession and aggravated by the Reagan administration's 1981 budget cuts in social welfare. The recession drafted unprecedented numbers into the ranks of the needy; the budget cuts dropped the safety nets out from under many of them.

In the last three years, 4.6 million, or one in eight previously participating Americans, have been cut from Federal food-assistance programs in Reagan's efforts to curb the federal deficit.

By 1985, the cuts will total $12.3 billion in real terms, according to the bipartisan Congressional Budget Office. That figure, adjusted for inflation, takes into account what the level of funding each year would have been had the 1981 cuts not been enacted.

Defending those cuts, Reagan administration officials say they have only stripped waste from the programs and ensured that the truly eligible are not shortchanged. They also say they are spending more than ever on food programs, a fact that fails to account for inflation and the increased number of needy during recent periods of high unemployment.

Though critics dispute the government's claims, they agree that to single out the Reagan administration for blame is to miss the point.

Rather, a whole decade of policy changes adopted under Republican and Democratic administrations was abetted by a tide of conservatism that swept the nation, accompanied by economic hardship.

"The economic stress the nation is going through, be it from inflation or unemployment or the national debt, has struck people in such a way that their better natures are not being tapped now," said Amy Fine, director of the University of North Carolina's Child Health Outcomes Project, a group monitoring key indicators of children's health.

"I don't see much difference in the conditions of hunger now and in the '60s," said Bard Schollenberger, policy analyst on domestic hungry for Bread for the World, a nonprofit food-policy research group. "The only difference is that there's not a strong commitment on the part of policymakers to do much about it," he continued. "The major thing lacking is a political will."

That middle-class America was growing increasingly reluctant to share its dwindling wealth with those less prosperous was reflected by the 30 percent decline from 1970 to 1980 in benefits from the basic welfare grant program, Aid to Families with Dependent Children [AFDC]. The figure represents decisions about benefit levels and eligibility made repeatedly by most of the 50 states during that decade.

By the 1980 presidential election, America—out of work, running out of hope—was ready for a candidate who promised to put the people back to work, the economy back on its feet.

To do that, Reagan cut taxes with the 1981 Tax Act, arguing that people with more money to spend would buy more and provide more jobs. Need would be relieved with such "trickle-down" economics, he said, not government spending.

The 1981 Omnibus Budget and Reconciliation Act, another of Reagan's keys to putting the nation on the course to recovery, instituted the sharpest cutbacks in federal nutrition programs since their inception.

More specifically, the Reagan administration's 1981 budget cuts have meant that:

900,000 people have lost eligibility for food stamps and, by 1985, the program cumulatively will have been slashed in real terms by $7 billion, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

A recent nationwide survey conducted by the nonprofit Food Research and Action Center found that two-thirds of the households receiving food stamps deplete their monthly allotment by the second or third week of the month.

3.2 million children, 40 percent of them from low-income families, no longer get school lunch, and 475,000 children no longer get school breakfast. In 1981, the Child Nutrition Programs budget was cut by a third, or $1 billion, the budget office reports. By 1985, the cumulative cuts will be $5.2 billion, adjusted for inflation.

493,000 families have been dropped from AFDC rolls because of tightened eligibility, according to Congress' General Accounting Office. In 26 states, families with incomes at 50 percent of the poverty level are ineligible. In 1981, federal AFDC spending was slashed $1 billion, combined with the resulting loss in state matching funds of another $1 billion, the budget office reports. By 1985, the cumulative federal cuts will be $2.4 billion after adjustment for inflation.

Women, infants and children, considered high-risk for nutritional deficiencies, have fared well since 1981: Spending for the federal supplemental feeding program for that group has almost doubled to $1.4 billion, but only because Congress repeatedly rejected the administration's efforts to cut the program each year by more than a third, or 1.5 million recipients. Not an entitlement program, the Women, Infants, Children fund serves only 3 million of the 8.9 million eligible recipients. Nationwide, 300 counties, or one in 10, still have no such program because of its limited spending level.

Those changes alone do not account for hunger's resurgence, critics acknowledge. Rather, the problem has been compounded by the fact that the cuts came at a time when the nation's poor were in need of more, not less, government support.

"The re-emergence of hunger is clearly tied to the whole picture of federal aid," said public health analyst Fine. "The food programs are there to help those in need, and if you have increased need, even if you have maintained the food programs, you're going to have a bigger problem.

"The need under the current administration has been exacerbated by cuts across the board," Fine said. "They did not take into account that unemployment would increase the need for assistance. The administration is saying funding rose or stayed the same. That's true, but that's skirting the issue."

The Reagan administration argues that though unemployment peaked at 10.8 percent in December, 1982, there are now 5.4 million more Americans at work than when Reagan took office. But labor statistics also show that there are 469,000 more people out of work now than in January, 1981. Both figures are seasonally adjusted, meaning they account for summer work force expansions. The current jobless rate, at 7.5 percent, is the same as when Reagan took office.

The administration's claim, made by Meese last December, that food-program spending was at an all-time high was later undercut by the Agriculture Department, which showed that food prices rose 15 percent from 1980 to 1983 and that each 1 percent rise in unemployment adds about $600 million a year to food stamp costs.

Through it all, more and more Americans found themselves scraping to get by: A laid-off steelworker's wife serves no more than canned corn to her four teenage sons; a welfare mother fries leftover chicken bones for her husband and five children; an out-of-work business executive knocks on a North Shore church's door, begging for a bag of day-old bread, bruised apples and a few cans of stew.

New poor, old poor, homeless—their unemployment benefits exhausted, their disability claims denied, their welfare benefits reduced or terminated, their income taxes increased—all stand in the food lines, marooned by an economy that bottomed out around them. This summer some of those lines have shrunk, but those still there say they're growing more desperate.

In April, the budget office issued a report showing that the Reagan administration's combined budget cuts and tax changes caused an average loss of $1,100 for households with $10,000 annual incomes, while the same 1981 initiatives meant an average gain of $24,000 for households with $80,000-plus annual incomes.

In June, the number of unemployed Americans receiving benefits, 29 percent of the 8.1 million jobless, hit an all-time low. That compared with more than 60 percent of the unemployed who received benefits during the corresponding month after the 1975 recession, said Robert Greenstein, director of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a Washington, D.C., nonprofit research and analysis organization.

No doubt hunger's caseload is vast, but pinning a number to it is an elusive task. When experts estimate that 47.1 million, or one in five, Americans live at or near the poverty level of $10,178 annual income for a family of four in 1983, that is at best a rough calculation.

Not all of those poor Americans, 17 million of whom are children and 5.9 million 65 and over, are hungry every day, but many are exposed to chronic undernutrition because too often they cannot afford adequate food.

Perhaps the best documentation that hunger is on the rise is the dramatic increase in malnutrition-related health problems reported by hospitals across the country in the last three years.

Despite critics' claims, this national malady has not escaped Reagan's attention. Indeed, last September he remarked: "If even one American child is forced to go to bed hungry at night, or if one senior citizen is denied the dignity of proper nutrition, that is a national tragedy."

But a few months later, Meese, one of Reagan's closest aides, created a furor when he said: ". . . We've had considerable information that people go to soup kitchens because the food is free and that that's easier than paying for it."

Defending the administration, John Bode, deputy assistant agriculture secretary of food and consumer services, said his department's cuts fit into the overriding Reagan agenda of curbing the federal deficit by trimming program misspending.

Critics of the food stamp program have long said fraud riddled the system, and tales of black-market counterfeiting and trafficking are rampant. In fact, such incidents are exaggerated: 90 percent of the misspending occurs at the "front end of the system between caseworkers and applicants," said the Agriculture Department's Robb Austin. "The majority of that is not out-and-out fraud but rather errors in issuance levels because of inaccurate reporting about income and household composition."

To counter such misspending, the Reagan administration launched an all-out attack on the problem by instituting a series of safety checks and increasing state accountability for program administration.

From 1981 through 1983, the food stamp program's error rate declined 14 percent, for an annual savings of $900 million, according to Agriculture Department reports. Though $1 in $10 is still misspent, the current margin of error of 8.5 percent is the lowest ever.

Further, Bode noted that food stamps were never intended to provide every meal for the needy. Rather, he said, the program was conceived as a means to provide a food supplement for low-income families to ensure at least minimum nutrition.

"Judgments about changes made in the nutrition-assistance programs shouldn't be made in terms of how much money is thrown in their direction," Bode said. "but rather in terms of how well that money is targeted."

He pointed out that the $19.2 billion currently spent on federal food-assistance programs still provides 21.4 million people with food stamps; 12 million schoolchildren with lunches; 3 million women, infants and children with supplemental feedings; and 2.1 million low income elderly with daily meals.

That may be, but critics argue that while targeting is important, the total level of spending still must be increased to solve the hunger problem. Study after study points to the programs' success in improving the nutritional status of low-income recipients.

Dr. Frederick L. Trowbridge, renowned nutritionist with the federal Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta, compiled data from 270,000 low-income children between 1976 and 1982 and found that the nutritional status of those enrolled in government food programs was improved for the first time since the 1960s.

"Once we commit ourselves to licking hunger, it's a relatively easy task," said Schollenberger, of Bread for the World. "In the short term, we need to expand those food programs already in place. The food stamp program is the nation's No. 1 weapon against hunger. We need to allow it to work.

It is frequently argued that one way to attack hunger is to reform the nation's farm programs, which are blamed for creating artificially high prices for milk and other commodities, or to distribute to the hungry the millions of pounds of surplus food stored by the federal government. Some blame the giant food-processing companies and their multimillion dollar advertising budgets for encouraging many poor people to spend their meager food dollars on more convenient but less nutritious foods.

But assessing the blame is not that easy. Farm surpluses also help keep prices low, and past efforts to hand the surplus products to the poor have run into serious distribution problems. The efficiency of the food-processing system is one of the major reasons Americans spend less of their incomes on food than do people in most other countries.

The consensus for a long-term solution to hunger centers on jobs—the creation of jobs, job training and matching job skills. Experts on both sides of the debate agree: Put people to work and they'll have the money to buy the food they need.

"That alone will never do," counters policy analyst Greenstein. "We forget that the bulk of the poor are out of the labor force; there is always a need for a basic safety net system. It's not a terribly arcane question as to what to do to alleviate hunger; it's really a political question."

The idea of a national policy that creates jobs for those who are able and provides a guaranteed income for those who are not has long been controversial. "This is one area where there's definitely a clear ideological division in policy," Greenstein said.

Last January, Democratic presidential candidate Walter Mondale revealed a plan to cut the deficit in half that included $10 billion in restorations in low-income programs, with food and hunger programs specifically marked for increases. Although at San Francisco's recent convention he vowed to cut the deficit by two-thirds and acknowledged that more taxes are needed, insiders speculate that those restorations—though smaller—will still appear on Mondale's agenda.

In May, David Stockman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, spoke before the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and said that 1985 was the administration's year to go after major additional budget cuts to cut the national debt. "There is little question around town," Greenstein said, "that deep cuts in the low-income programs are being drawn up."

Hunger did not come to America overnight and it will not go away quickly or quietly. Its history here is long and complex. Its solution, "a redirection of the items on the national policy agenda," Greenstein said, is not so easy.

"We need a president, a Congress and an American people committed to voting hunger out of the country," he said.

NEEDY FALL THROUGH TATTERED "SAFETY NET"

(By Christopher Drew)

In many ways, Katherine, a 28-year-old black woman living on the city's South Side, is a typical welfare mother. She grew up in a public housing project and now depends solely on public aid to support herself and her 8-year-old daughter.

Never married, she tried to break out of this cycle of dependency by working when she was in her early 20s. But she gave up hope for employment after her other child, a baby boy, crawled into a refrigerator and suffocated while in the care of a sitter.

These days, Katherine isn't as worried about her daughter's safety as she is about putting enough bread on the table to feed her.

While the general cost of living has jumped 25 percent in the last four years, Katherine's food stamp and welfare benefits have risen only half as much, from $336 a month to $378. As a result, she said, even sticking to a limited diet such as hot cereal for breakfast and turkey wings and potatoes for dinner isn't enough to keep her cupboards from running bare.

"At the end of the month I usually start running short of food, and I have to borrow to get things," she said. "I may borrow from a girlfriend who gets her stamps at a different time or go to my mother's, or the lady next door will give me hamburger patties."

Katherine's problems illustrate how sharp cuts in the nation's aid programs have forced many of the poor to scrounge more than ever for a square meal. Few are starving, but many clearly are seeing less balance in their diets, and medical researchers say this is contributing to an alarming increase in malnutrition-related diseases in some parts of the country.

The basic aid programs were created in the 1960s by a nation eager to root out the kind of Third World squalor then evident in Appalachia, the rural South and some urban ghettos.

By most accounts, the programs quickly eradicated the worst conditions and, by the mid-1970s, they were even making progress toward lifting the standard of living for all poor Americans. But then inflation started eroding the public's generosity, and the Carter administration and a number of states began looking for ways to tighten program budgets.

Critics say, however, that the "safety net" that had started to be woven under the poor didn't start unraveling until the early 1980s, when the recession threw many people out of work and the deficit-conscious Reagan administration decided to target social programs for its biggest cutbacks.

The recession barred critical flaws in the fabric of the aid programs. Many of the "new poor"—the laid-off autoworkers, the unemployed steelworkers—had expensive assets such as houses and cars and couldn't qualify for food stamps. Their only recourse was to scurry for the food pantries run by charitable organizations.

The budget cuts instead hit welfare mothers and disabled and elderly people, but the result was the same: Even though many of these people had come to depend on the government to take care of them, they were forced for at least a few days each month, to join the swell outside the food banks.

And while the economic recovery has put some of the new poor back to work, the traditional poor find themselves falling further and further behind.

"I know of no one who can have an adequate supply of food and clothing on a welfare budget today," said Sister Hannah Marie O'Brien, a nun who runs a food bank in one of the poorest sections of New Orleans. "There's no doubt that this is a very bad time for all the people who are dependent on the government."

In proposing the cuts, White House officials said the welfare programs had gotten fat, and they argued that they could achieve substantial savings and provide more benefits to the most needy by clamping down on waste and fraud and by kicking the less needy off the rolls.

Critics say the cuts they pushed through Congress went far beyond that, and numerous government and private studies support their contention.

In the food stamp program, the basic line of defense against hunger, the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office has estimated that the total reductions will reach $7 billion in real terms by 1985, and even the President's Task Force on Food Assistance concluded that only a small part of the savings will result from cutting waste or dropping 900,000 of the less needy from the program.

Instead, the task force said, most of the savings will come from reducing or delaying benefit increases to the 21 million remaining recipients, most with incomes below the poverty line, currently defined as $10,200 for a family of four.

Studies also show that the damage from the cuts in food stamps has been compounded for many impoverished families by an additional $5.3 billion in cuts in several supplemental programs.

While their food stamps are running out faster, many families have found that their checks from the Aid to Families with Dependent Children [AFDC] program aren't stretching as far, their Medicaid cards aren't covering as many services, their children aren't getting as many free meals at school and their public-housing rents are going up.

Their distress over this and what they see as penny ante changes in program rules has heightened tension and even led to violence at many welfare offices, administrators say.

Perhaps more disturbing—and surprising, given the President's desire to get people off the dole—is how the cutbacks have reduced incentives to work and shoved some of the working poor further into poverty.

In a five-city survey, the General Accounting Office [GAO], an investigative arm of Congress, found that many of the working poor who were dropped from the welfare rolls couldn't boost their earnings enough to make up for the lost benefits. A significant number were left without medical coverage, and they frequently had to turn to relatives for money and charities for food, the study said.

Interestingly enough, most of these people decided to keep working rather than go back on welfare, the GAO said. But other analysts, including economist Arthur B. Laffer, one of the architects of the President's theory of supply-side economics, say the fear of losing medical coverage or suffering an overall income decline seems to be keeping others still on welfare from taking jobs.

Critics, of course, contend that the poor are being shortchanged to pay for the administration's defense build-up.

Administration officials counter that the willingness of private charities and relatives to step in and help the disadvantaged over the roughest spots proves one of their basic arguments—that the government doesn't have to shoulder all the responsibility for feeding the poor.

The officials point out that the government continues to spend a substantial amount on food programs—about $20 billion a year—and assist 1 in 10 Americans. They also maintain that some of the problems stem from factors beyond the government's control, such as poor household budgeting.

"So when we have these discussions about 'Do we have hunger in America?' I think we need to ask ourselves, If we do, is it a question that money is going to solve?" said Mary C. Jarratt, the Agriculture Department undersecretary in charge of administering food and nutrition programs.

Many of the poor "are needy one month, but not necessarily the next," she said. "It's a changing base. But I don't feel that the resources are not there, because if people want them, they can get them."

Jarratt said the department has cut waste in the food stamp program to the lowest level ever, saving $900 million a year, and has succeeded in targeting more of the benefit payments to the poorest recipients.

But she expressed concern about the effect of the cutbacks on the working poor and said she has assigned an aide to check into the cause of increases in malnutrition-related diseases.

Still, even some fairly conservative Republicans are concerned that the food programs have been slashed too deeply, and congressmen on both sides of the aisle say Reagan will face tough sledding if the tries to parlay his landslide reelection into further benefit cuts. There also appears to be a growing conviction in Congress that more needs to be done to address the underlying problems, such as joblessness, that lead to hunger.

"We are not attacking the root causes, and this bothers me more than anything," said Rep. Bill Emerson of Missouri, the ranking Republican on a House subcommittee that oversees nutrition programs.

The Tribune, in interviews with social workers and welfare recipients, found clear evidence of the greater suffering because of the food-assistance cutbacks and of a need for more training and counseling to help people get out of the welfare rut. But it was also clear that private sources are easing some of the worst problems—though many charities insist they can't get enough food to meet the demand—and that the poor don't always make the wisest budget choices.

In places such as Chicago and New Orleans, a typical Southern city with a large poor population, most of the welfare recipients interviewed reported running low on food much more often than they used to. And their descriptions of their diets—long on starches and fatty cuts of meat and short on fruits and vegetables—would have made any nutritionist cringe.

"Everything's gone up so much, and we have not got much of an increase" in benefits, Donna London said as she stood in line at Hope House, a Catholic charity in New Orleans, late last month for a bag of canned and dried goods for herself and her 11-year-old son. "So my food runs out before the end of the month, and I got to come here to survive."

"I eat neckbones and pig tails and, once a week, a cheap cut of chicken or turkey legs with macaroni or potatoes," said Thelma Boyd, 67, who is confined to a wheelchair and lives alone in New Orleans in a tin-roofed shack decorated with religious pictures and drawings of John F. Kennedy and Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. "The doctor said I'm supposed to drink fruit juice, but I can't afford it, so I drink Kool-Aid instead."

Doctors in both cities have linked such dietary deficiencies to increased health problems, such as last year's 24 percent increase in pediatric admissions at Cook County Hospital for stunted growth, dehydration and weight loss. Social workers say the greater difficulty in providing for their families has been a severe blow to the self-esteem of many poor people.

"Most of them are angry when they come into the pantry; they're angry at themselves that they have to ask for food," said J. Pat Morris, director of a food bank at South Deering United Methodist Church on Chicago's Far South Side.

More often than not, this hostility boils over at the welfare offices.

As part of the campaign against fraud and waste, the Reagan administration got Congress to require welfare recipients to file more frequent income reports—monthly rather than annually in some cases. But in many cities, caseworkers haven't been able to keep up with the flood of reports, and each month many food stamp clients are cut off because of clerical problems, according to the state officials who administer the program for the federal government.

This requires a trip to the welfare office to re-enroll, which adds to the burden on the welfare workers and causes tempers to flare on both sides. As a result, some welfare offices have come to resemble armed camps.

On one recent morning, guards in olive uniforms patrolled the drab lobby of the office in New Orleans, and the dozens of clients clustered there needed to get passes to take an elevator to a higher floor. Samaria Harris, a thin, pert mother of two, was sitting on one of the plastic chairs, coughing and wheezing from what she described as a case of jangled nerves.

"I had an appointment for 9:30, and it's 10:45, and I'm still here, she complained. She finally got called about 11:15, but after she finished her appointment she was fuming even more.

Though Harris was down to just a few bags of beans and rice in her kitchen, the caseworker had threatened to suspend her benefits because she didn't have documentation that $200 she got from a friend was a loan and not a gift. "They talk to you so rough and nasty," she said.

Still, the motivation behind this kind of scrutiny was apparent on a visit to one of Harris' neighbors, who couldn't pay her water bill and had to borrow food for her four children. As she talked about her problems on the crumbling front porch of her rented house—a hole in the front of her dress pinned shut—a 4-foot-wide console color television blared out soap operas in the living room.

Food bank officials confirm that they have been reaching many of the people in need especially since Congress authorized the Agriculture Department three years ago to temporarily distribute surplus milk and cheese to the pantries. But they said they don't have the resources to help many of the worst cases, including an increasing number of homeless people who can't get food stamps because they don't have a permanent address.

Waving her arm to guide a visitor's eyes across the nearly empty shelves of the Hope House pantry, Sister Ruth Marie Doyle spoke for a lot of food bank administrators when she argued that the most sensible solution would be for Congress to restore some of the spending cuts.

"It's just much more difficult to move the system now to help someone," she said. "They say they don't have the money."

Social workers argue that Congress also needs to rescind cuts in job training, mental health counseling and other social programs.

Moved by these problems, a coalition of Democrats and moderate Republicans in Congress plans to press next year to undo a few of the food program cutbacks and to raise the asset limits for food stamps to keep some of the new poor from falling through the cracks in the programs.

But several of the congressmen said they doubted they would make much headway. They expect the White House to push for further cutbacks and even stricter rules, and the likely result will be tradeoffs involving minor increases in benefits and further administrative tightening.

Both sides agree about the need to address the underlying problems, but their proposals differ, and little significant action seems likely.

The White House believes job training should be left largely to the private sector, but administration officials also would like to require all welfare recipients to perform community services to pay for their benefits and gain some work experience. Most Democrats, however, argue that such "workfare" programs, in practice in some states, don't prepare people for jobs unless they are combined with intensive—and expensive—training and counseling programs.

"People worry the most about the children in these welfare situations, because we could get another generation . . . on that dependency," said Rep. Emerson. Whatever the differences in approach, he said, "I think we're remiss in not addressing that."

ALL POOR AREN'T EQUAL UNDER STATES' LAWS

(By Barbara Mahany)

It's dinner time at Willamae Flemister's South Side row house, and 10 arms are flailing for a plate of fried chicken bones. Little more than flour and grease grace these leftover bones, but that's better than next week's menu: "catch-as-catch-can."

Flemister can stretch a single fryer three weeks—first roast, then soup, then fried backbones—but by month's end, when the food stamps run out and the cupboard's near bare, it's slim eating here. That's when the children eat first, and if anything's left it's shared by Flemister and her husband, Richard, Jr., who says he's disabled by a disorder that involves seizures. If nothing's left, they go without.

Getting by on monthly checks of $296 in food stamps and $556 in welfare, the Flemisters have a tough time making it, they say. So tough, they've had to send two of their seven children to live at their grandmother's.

Prices at the corner market "eat quick" through their checks; discount stores are too hard to get to by bus, they explain. Winter cold blows brisk through the front-door cracks, pushing heating bills through the roof.

Chicago, they conclude, is a "nasty place to be poor."

If it's nasty in Chicago, it's even nastier in Greenwood, Miss., said Zuella McNelson, who, like the Flemisters, has seven children, is poor and gets monthly welfare checks and food stamps. There, the similarities end.

McNelson gets $196 in food stamps and $144 in welfare each month. That puts her $512 below the Flemisters. The only thing that separates them is state lines—three, to be exact.

But the 647-mile difference—and the respective legislatures that set policy and benefit levels for state welfare programs—put a 60-percent difference between the families' monthly incomes, though the best available government statistics suggest it is only 23 percent cheaper for poor people to live in Greenwood than in Chicago.

That statistical average, though, too easily glosses over the starkness of McNelson's poverty. The Flemisters, for example, pay $39.50 a month for a two-story, three-bedroom Chicago Housing Authority apartment; the McNelsons pay $65 a month to a landlord and crowd two families into a three-room shotgun shack.

Depending on one's spot on the map, and the whims of one's state government, one can receive lower benefits or face higher hurdles to get into government-aid programs.

The result is a patchwork of state programs that pull apart, at a local level, whatever federal programs have been sewn together in Washington.

There is no single safety net stretching from coast to coast, providing uniform support for the nation's poor and near-poor. Rather, imbalances in states' revenues, expenditures and policymaking loosen the weave, sometimes making it more likely the poor will fall through the holes.

Sad testimony to that is Zuella McNelson. Staring out from the front stoop of her Mississippi Delta shack, hers is a panorama of some of the nation's most glaring poverty.

Her body bone-thin, her bare feet dusty, an oleander bush shading her back, McNelson, 34, brushes away her 3-year-old son and talks bitterly about the system that allowed her three times as much welfare at her former Detroit address as at her home on Cotton Street. Her widowed father's lingering battle with throat cancer is the only thing that brought her back to Greenwood.

"It's like this here in Mississippi, we're livin' raggedy," she says, kicking a chunk of plaster off the porch. "You can't make it through a month on what they give you. It's just pitiful. Once you leave this state, it's another world, Detroit, it wasn't no heaven, but this . . . this is hell."

McNelson is not the first nor the only one to complain about the absence of a uniform national social welfare policy or a guaranteed federal income.

The issue is one that has reared its head many times in national debates. Its most noted appearance was the Nixon administration's Family Assistance Plan of 1969, which called for a limited version of a guaranteed annual income. Despite its billing as the welfare reform plan that would attack poverty at its roots rather than merely pruning its attendant symptoms—hunger being a chief one—through a piecemeal approach of disparate programs, the plan died in Congress three years later.

Inherent in that defeat—aside from a national distaste for welfare, thought to grate against the American work ethic—were lawmakers' arguments that a flat rate would raise overall welfare costs, underpay residents of high-cost areas and overpay residents in low-cost areas.

The concerns still exist, but they are countered by a mounting cry that the safety net is unraveling and poverty and hunger are on the rise.

The resurgence of hunger and poverty in America "clearly is a national problem that warrants a national response," said Barbara Leyser, social policy analyst with the Center on Social Welfare Policy and Law in Washington.

The main threads of the safety net intended to keep the poor from becoming the hungry are the federal food stamp program and the basic welfare grant, Aid to Families with Dependent Children [AFDC], a program overseen by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, administered by state governments and funded by both.

But the poor's access to food is affected by state variances. Those include sales tax on food [17 states have a tax, ranging from 3 percent in Wyoming, Oklahoma, North Carolina and Georgia, to 6 percent in Mississippi], public transportation, food costs based on proximity to production sites and a potpourri of cash-assistance programs that may or may not exist in various states, counties or municipalities.

For example, only 36 states have general-assistance programs for poor people who are otherwise unqualified for aid because they are single, without children or not disabled, according to government reports. Of those, 19 have uniform state standards with ongoing cash payments. The rest are variations on a limted theme.

Even if the programs exist, the issue is tangled by a variety of rules, regulations and benefit levels left to the discretion of local governments.

Unemployment compensation, for instance, ranges from minimum weekly payments of $5 in Hawaii to $60 in North Dakota and from maximum weekly benefits of $84 in Indiana to $278 in Massachusetts. The duration of payments can be as short as 20 weeks, as it is in Puerto Rico, or as long as 30 weeks, as in Massachusetts and Washington state.

But it's the differences in AFDC and food stamps from state to state that account for the major inequities in aid to the poor.

Maximum AFDC payments vary sharply from state to state, with a low of $96 a month for a family of three in Mississippi to a high of $696 a month for a three-person family in Alaska, according to reports from the Congressional Research Service.

In only one state does the combination of AFDC and food stamp benefits meet the federally set poverty threshold [$10,178 annually for a family of four in 1983], the research service reported. But closer inspection showed a wide range of percentages, with Mississippi's combined benefits equaling only 45 percent of the poverty level and Alaska's equaling 108 percent of the poverty level.

The difference in payments is said to take into account variations in living costs, as well as revenue available to state legislatures, but critics say the system isn't working.

"Clearly there is no evidence of cost-of-living differences to support the wide variations in needs and benefits," said Leyser, the social policy analyst. "A lot of that is strictly political."

Though it is true that states such as Mississippi, with the nation's lowest per capita income, have less money than others, critics of state-set benefit levels argue that residents of poor states should not be penalized for living there, while wealthier states—or states with fewer needy residents—can afford to provide more benefits.

The Reagan administration sees it otherwise, resting instead on the pillar of federalism that admonishes, "The further control is from the people, the less likely that it is responsive to their needs."

Says Barabara Levering, spokeswoman for Health and Human Service's Family Assistance office: "For 50 years this has been largely a state-run program. Maybe you'd gain some apparent, superficial benefit in the cohesion [brought about by a federal program], but you'd lose the chance to respond to needs as they are, not as someone in Washington thinks they are."

In addition to differences in AFDC benefit levels, states also determine eligibility from a wide array of variables. In 27 states, two-parent households are ineligible for aid, regardless of work status or income level. In 10 states, "able-bodied" recipients must participate in workfare programs—minimum-wage government jobs—to get aid. In 23 states, pregnant women get no aid for unborn children.

With food stamps, the problem is not eligibility or benefit levels—those are set uniformly nationwide by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. Rather, it is the workings of the program that have administrators "choking and strangling in bureaucracy," while recipients are "forced to go hungry, waiting for stamps," said Donald B. Roark, chairman of the food stamp committee of the National Council of State Public Welfare Administrators.

Bearing the weight of a federal food stamp policy change once every 10 days on average in the last year, Roark, also Mississippi's public welfare commissioner, calls the red tape "an administrative nightmare, a needless jungle of paperwork." He cites the yeasty expansion of the food stamp manual from 40 pages in 1965 to 978 pages at last check.

It's not much better for the food stamp applicants who must fill out four-page forms in Mississippi, but must wade through 38-page forms in Alaska.

Driven by the Agriculture Department's mandate to slash error rates to less than 5 percent by 1986 or else—pay costly penalties, states are scrambling to catch fraud and abuse.

So much so that recipients like a man in rural Georgia was told by his local office that he had to hitch a ride two miles to a local farmer, known to be hiring workers, and get an affidavit proving he was not one of those hired before he could file for food stamps. That story, told by attorney Nancy Lindbloom of Georgia Legal Services, is repeated with a few plot twists all around the country.

An Arkansas county requires its food stamp applicants to obtain letters from at least five banks stating they do not have savings accounts at the institutions. Only then are their applications processed.

In Greenwood, Miss., local residents refer to a term of fraud investigators as "The Gestapo" saying they go so far as to check to see if women who claim they are unmarried have men's shoes in the closet—a sure clue, the officials charge, that someone may be surreptitiously adding to monthly income and thus bilking the government.

Behind these concrete differences in program spending, rules and regulations are differences in attitudes about the poor in general and welfare in particular.

Local charges that Yankee pride in New England, racism in the South and the frontier spirit in the West put up barriers to justice and equal rights for America's downtrodden add to the regional texture of the social welfare net and make it seem all the more uneven.

The situation, summed up by Zuella McNelson: "Hardly seems like America when you got so many ways to be poor. Don't no one in Washington care about us just 'cause we're livin so bad out here in places they don't never see.

STORES FORSAKE THOSE WHO NEED THEM MOST

(By Barbara Mahany and Christopher Drew)

When the "Out of Business" sign was recently posted on the last of seven groceries in Aliquippa, Pa.—a nearly boarded-up steel town in the heart of America's Rust Belt—Linda Twigger was left with a tough choice.

The 37-year-old mother and caretaker of two, whose truck-driver husband was laid off nine years ago from the town's only steel mill, could walk 2½ miles to the nearest store and get three bags of groceries for $109 in food stamps.

Or, if—as is usually the case—no one's around from whom Twigger could thumb a ride, she could pay $15 to an illegal jitney driver for a round trip to a discount supermarket where lower prices made it possible for her to purchase six bags of groceries with the same amount of stamps. That ride would cost Twigger more than one-seventh of her grocery money, a day's worth of food.

"That's highway robbery," Twigger said, thumping her fist on the sill of the kitchen window overlooking Aliquippa's dead-silent main street. "This town's too poor to even afford a taxi, so we gotta pay through the nose or walk."

Twigger's dilemma is one increasingly common among America's poor as more and more supermarkets move out of small towns and inner cities, seeking instead rich suburban markets. The poor are left with no choice but to pay dearly for rides or depend on high-priced corner markets.

Partly to patch such flaws in the modern-day food chain, the government recently stepped up the distribution of surplus farm commodities to the needy, a practice that was largely abandoned a decade ago in favor of food stamps.

But, as Twigger, a recipient of this largesse, points out, the limited offerings—mostly cheese, butter and dry milk—don't make for balanced meals. And that, along with opposition from some agribusiness interests, is what keeps commodity distribution from being more than a partial solution to the nation's increasing hunger problems, experts say.

"You know when it's the end of the month here," Twigger said, "because we squeeze in a whole lot of macaroni and cheese, grilled cheese and cheese omelettes."

Twigger's story typifies the plight of the poor and the near poor, who are hard-pressed to stretch evershrinking food dollars through a month's worth of menus.

Obvious reasons for the shortfalls at the grocery—and an attendant rise in hunger among America's poor—include the recent across-the-board cuts in federal and state benefits and the perennial rise in food prices, though the rate of increase has slowed from 10.9 percent in 1979, to 3.6 percent so far this year.

Beyond that, though, are problems that lie in the day-to-day workings of the agribusiness establishment—the sector of the modern economy that moves food from farm to grocery, determining the prices and availability of products along the way.

Experts marvel at the system's ability to grow enough food to feed the nation twice over and distribute it so efficiently that few Americans are starving and the average American family spends only 16 percent of its disposable income on food—less than people almost anywhere else.

Critics, however, say Americans still have to pay more for their food than they should.

Backed by many government and private studies, they argue that the food companies—through their multimillion-dollar advertising campaigns or sometimes deceptive packaging—encourage consumers to squander their food dollars on more convenient but less nutritious items. Advertisers, however, argue that creating national brand markets holds down prices by eliminating duplicate costs of marketing on a region-to-region basis.

Critics also point with alarm to the growing number of mergers in the food industry, a phenomenon that contributes to even higher prices.

Some also argue that the government's programs to boost farm incomes add to the cost of food, but others say these increases are offset by the savings that result from the recurring surpluses created by those programs.

Rich and poor alike pay for these problems. But the poor in particular are hurt, because for them, one added cost, one unanticipated expense, means that some foods must be stricken from their grocery lists.

Says Pat Slaughter, a mother of seven in Yarmouth, Me., who shops with a blue suitcase full of coupons, "If prices are higher than I plan for, I don't have the luxury of scrimping elsewhere in my menu. I just cut out fruit or milk, and we fill up on starch."

Because their budgets are so precariously pieced together with the start, one of the most critical agribusiness problems facing the poor is the migration of supermarkets away from where they live. For many rural poor, this has long been a problem. For others, it is getting worse.

Not too dissimilar from the "white flight" that sociologists say has shifted inner-city demographics, the trend toward fewer big chain stores within the urban core is one supermarket analysts say leaves many of those living there with little choice but to pay higher prices. Often, the quality and selection of foods inside those stores is poor at best.

In Chicago, for instance, the A&P and National Tea chains long served the inner city, but in the late 1970s, both pulled out, weary from intense competition. Industry officials say Safeway Stores, another of the biggest chains, has practically deserted Washington, D.C., in favor of surrounding suburbs.

A "black tax"—the term industry insiders give to an extra mark-up said to cover the added costs of inner-city operations such as pilferage and higher real estate costs and taxes—usually accounts for a 1 percent to 2 percent price differential between city and suburban stores but may push prices as much as 10 percent higher in the city, industry officials acknowledged.

"Some difference in the prices probably makes sense, but I don't think the black tax is fully justified," said a Chicago-based official of a major food company who keeps track of the disparities in retail prices of his company's products. "Maybe 1 percent or 2, but not 10 percent."

He pointed out that retail chains typically divide metropolitan areas into a dozen or more price zones, with the highest generally in the inner city. "Yep, the poor pay more," he said, "and they're trapped and penalized by their environment."

Industry analysts said some warehouse groceries, the huge discount operations popping up all over the suburbs, would love to locate closer to the inner city because poor people would undoubtedly flock to them. They are barred, analysts said, because real estate prices are at a premium and they have trouble finding enough open space for their block-long stores.

Still, the enticement of lower prices at the suburban chains or warehouse stores draws some bargain-minded shoppers out of the inner city, but their savings are consumed by delivery charges as high as $10. On Chicago's South Side, Virginia Morgan said that fee kept her from shopping for her family of 13 more than once a month.

To avoid paying more than once for the long-distance delivery, Morgan and others like her said they depend the rest of the month on the "mom and pop" groceries that still grace many an urban corner.

These markets push inner-city price averages up because they get their food from independent wholesalers who base their prices on the retailer's volume; hence, the smaller the store, the higher the wholesale price it pays.

Because operating costs are so high already, many small-time storeowners said they try to keep the lid on prices by purchasing lower-grade produce. It's not unusual to see bruised apples or heads of lettuce in a bin. Because of low volume, turnover is slow and out-of-date dairy products can often be found on the shelves.

But one thing those stores offer that big stores wouldn't dream of giving their customers is credit. Often, though, shoppers become tied to the higher-priced stores by hard-to-break credit cycles.

"People get roped into the corner stores," said social worker Joie Kammer of Greenwood, Miss., "because when times are lean they let them run up credit. In order to keep up the credit, they keep going back there and never break away to bigger, less expensive stores."

Another problem is that food prices can vary greatly from region to region. So, by the accident of geography, some poor find the odds are stacked even higher against them in their struggle to get more for their food dollars.

During a recent market survey done by The Tribune in a dozen regions from Maine to Northern California, prices for the same 22-item market-basket at stores frequented by the poor showed variations of up to 34.5 percent, from $30.91 at The Giant Eagle, outside Aliquippa, Pa., to $41.62 at the Old Sawmill Trading Post, in Sawmill, Ariz.

While few would argue that some grocery industry policies have helped to distance the poor from affordable foods, there remains great debate about the degree to which the commodity surpluses—the results of other glitches in the nation's food chain—can bring the nation closer to ending hunger.

The stockpiles of grains and dairy products stored in government warehouses are quickly pointed to by critics who demand to know why—in the shadows of those mounds of wheat, corn, butter, cheese and powdered milk—hunger persists in America.

Those stockpiles are sagging under the weight of 2.4 billion bushels of grain and 2.1 billion pounds of dairy products, enough to provide each American household with almost a ton of cereal and more than 26 pounds of dry milk, butter and cheese, although the cost of packing the foods into usable portions would be exorbitant. These goods were acquired by the government through programs designed to support farm incomes and stabilize prices.

But government officials say the limited range of available foods the massive problems involved in trying to store and distribute them and opposition from food processing companies limits the effectiveness of commodity distribution as a cure for hunger.

Processors fear government "dumping" of thousands of tons of cheap products into the open market would force down prices. Dairy processors complained about declining sales after Congress authorized distribution of surplus cheese after the first reports of increased hunger in 1981.

Although farmers say they would welcome distribution of the government's surpluses to the "truly needy," the problem is that most of the surplus grain is owned by farmers and not the government and can't be touched for distribution—even if it were already processed and put in family-sized packages.

It was these kinds of problems that led President Richard Nixon to choose food stamps over commodity distribution as the chief weapon in the war on hunger in 1974. He kept a minimal version of the commodity program alive as a supplement to a nutrition program for pregnant women, infants and children.

As a result, government officials now see commodity distribution as useful only as a supplement to other food assistance programs during times of increased need.

So in creating the emergency distribution program in 1981, said Christine Bolton, an aide to Sen. Robert J. Dole [R., Kan., chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and a key player in food policy legislation, "We never intended to create a new entitlement program. We just tried to link up two needs—to get rid of the agriculture surpluses and help a lot of people who need assistance."

Antihunger advocates agree that commodity distribution should not play a bigger role in the mix of food programs. Nancy Amidei, former director of the Food Research and Action Center, a Washington, D.C., research group, said she and others are afraid the expansion of the commodities program will be used, underhandedly, to pave the way for further cutbacks in the food stamps.

With the new acceptance of distribution as a tool in times of emergency, the food industry has stepped up its donations to the poor in an effort to help restock the nation's emptying pantries.

Perhaps the nation's biggest gleaner, Second Harvest, a nationwide network of 74 food banks, collects from 150 food manufacturers and retailers edible food that cannot be sold because it falls short of corporate standards—it may be mislabled, dented or out-of-date—and then distributes it to member food banks. The Chicago-based group has supplied its members with 160 million pounds of food since it was founded in 1979.

"In no way is this a solution to the problem of hunger in America," said Susan Fischer, the group's national director of operations. "But it's making a big difference in getting food to the hungry that would otherwise be burned or end up dumped in a landfill."●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, January 22, 1985, marked the 67th anniversary of the proclamation of independence in Ukraine. I would like to recognize this day and reaffirm my support for the spirit of freedom which is alive in those who are desparately trying to maintain their cultural, religious, and national identifies in the face of Soviet oppression.

Although the independent republic endured only 3 years, until Communist takeover in 1921, the Ukrainian spirit of freedom has not been quenched, for it is as prevalent in the hearts of Ukrainians today as it was in 1918.

For many years the courageous Ukrainian people have withstood the increased efforts of the Soviet Union to integrate them into the Soviet system. This system attempts to rob citizens of their national identity, culture, and religious traditions just as it has robbed so many independent republics of their independence throughout the years.

It is encouraging to know that brave Ukrainian freedom fighters speak out against Soviet oppression and fight for their individual rights, rights which are granted to citizens in any civilized nation. However, these courageous men and women pay a price for espousing the principles of democracy and freedom as they are charged with crimes committed against the state and are treated harshly, receiving particularly long terms of imprisonment and being denied the few rights which they possess such as visitation of relatives.

The Ukrainian situation is one for the United States to take note of as it it indicative of the expansionary and oppressive behavior of the Soviet Union today. Poland and Afghanistan are but two examples.

The Ukrainian people are fighting for the same freedoms and liberties which are embodied in our constitution and with which we have lived for over 200 years. While enjoying these guaranteed freedoms, we must recall the struggle which was undertaken to gain them and support all those who are involved in similar struggles.

Mr. Speaker, we must maintain our solidarity with the Ukrainian people and encourage their efforts to overcome oppression so they may once again enjoy the freedoms which they had briefly 67 years ago.●

NATO AND THE FUTURE OF UNITED STATES-WESTERN EUROPEAN RELATIONS

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, this month I had the opportunity to deliver a speech before European Parliamentarians in Brussels, Belgium, as part of an annual meeting of Members of Congress with that body. The basic premise of my statement is that while we have an obvious interest in being in Europe as part of our obligation to provide a check on Soviet activities, the U.S. Congress may decide to sponsor a reduction of U.S. troop levels in Europe if European nations do not agree to shoulder more of the financial and manpower burden of NATO. I would not, however, be inclined to favor an American troop reduction in Europe at this time because it might demonstrate to the Soviets during the upcoming arms control talks, a weakening of U.S. ties with our European allies. My remarks in full were as follows:

NATO AND THE FUTURE OF UNITED STATES-WESTERN EUROPEAN RELATIONS

In the past year, U.S. relations with Western Europe have undergone strains caused by different rates of economic growth and trade disagreements. However, the questions which have dominated much of the trans-Atlantic discussion are the status of NATO, the future of the American troops in Europe, and the equitable division of defense costs among NATO members. This debate affects the European Community not only because 9 of its 10 members are also members of NATO but because it is the current economic situation in Europe as well as in the United States which will greatly influence any solution of the problems raised in this debate.

Unlike the Mansfield amendment of a decade ago, the latest proposal threatening a possible reduction of U.S. troop levels was fathered by one of the closest friends NATO and Western Europe have in Congress, Senator Sam Nunn (Dem.-Georgia). It is the very fact that a respected figure like Senator Nunn has raised questions about NATO's welfare that has attracted so much congressional interest. I must stress that Senator Nunn's floor statement on NATO's present capabilities reflected the concern of many Members of the Senate and House. At present, I do not believe a comparable version of this amendment would pass in the Senate or House in 1985. However, I cannot be as certain about the following years. That will depend greatly on how Congress perceives European actions.

The Nunn-Roth amendment, although defeated by a 55-41 vote, correctly saw problems in the Atlantic Alliance. Its danger, which is why I oppose it, rested in the method by which it sought to obtain European agreement—the threatened removal of up to 90,000 U.S. troops during 1985-87. This is policy by intimidation rather than cooperation. Any reduction of U.S. troop levels in Europe should be accomplished through negotiation with our allies. A unilateral withdrawal of some or all U.S. forces would in fact produce the following negative results:

It would weaken the commitment of the United States to western security before both European and Soviet eyes. Not only are the 350,000 U.S. troops in Europe critical to the strategic balance in Europe, they are a symbol of U.S. determination to honor that commitment. The maintenance of a nuclear umbrella over Europe is not enough in itself to demonstrate that commitment by the United States; American troops are the necessary additional proof to our allies and the Soviets that the United States will join in the defense of its allies. Soviet policymakers have worked with that assumption for 35 years since NATO was created.

Removing U.S. troops would encourage the West European public and their governments to consider politics independent of NATO which would not be in the best interest of the United States. Without a demonstrable commitment of U.S. forces to Europe's security, many will question any remaining U.S. commitment and very likely recommend that their governments find a new relationship with the Soviet Union. Such developments could lead to NATO's disintegration and present enhanced opportunities for Soviet exploitation of Western Europe's weakened security.

U.S. troops have contributed to the stabilization of Europe. No one should suggest that the removal of these troops would cause an automatic resurgence of historical rivalries in Europe. But there is no doubt that the U.S. presence has helped heal the wounds of old suspicions and contributed greatly to the spirit which has let the European Community grow. Their removal would inevitably force Western Europe to redefine its security policy, and in the subsequent discussions long entrenched suspicions might well surface. This would be a blow to the postwar cohesion and stability of Europe.

Lastly, it is important for us Americans to remember that it would be difficult for our allies to replace 350,000 U.S. troops with their own. The pool of available manpower is shrinking. West Germany, for example, could not be expected to replace fully the 256,000 U.S. troops stationed there in 1982.

The supporters of the Nunn-Roth amendment stress the importance of meeting the guideline set by NATO in 1978 for annual increases in defense spending by each member nation—3 percent after inflation. Frankly, the record of the European allies has not been as good as it should be. Since 1981, according to the Department of Defense, between four and six NATO members besides the United States have annually matched or come close to this goal. Continued and sustained efforts to meet this goal are critical if NATO is going to take steps to increase its defensive capability, and to forestall additional support in the United States for the Nunn-Roth amendment or similar initiatives.

Nevertheless, it is dangerous to become too strict in pressing this guideline. In light of the present U.S. debate over cuts in defense spending, it is important to consider the economic reasons which may make it temporarily difficult for some NATO members to increase defense spending by this much. Also, it is worth considering that a 2.5-percent real increase that goes toward additional equipment and ammunition will do more for NATO's capability than a 3-percent real increase largely spent on salaries and other personnel costs.

Where Western Europe and the United States need to direct their energies is now the focus of discussion in the Atlantic Alliance. Rather than dwell on many of the technical issues which concern NATO specialists, I see several broader policy issues which, if effectively addressed, will strengthen our mutual security and diminish the appeal of the Nunn-Roth amendment.

NATO'S CONVENTIONAL STRENGTH

The upgrading of NATO's conventional capabilities is, in the view of NATO's new Secretary General, Lord Carrington, the highest priority. I wholeheartedly agree; historically, the Warsaw Pact has had more troops and conventional weapons. And at present, according to NATO's military commander, Gen. Bernard Rogers, NATO command would have to request an early use of nuclear weapons in order to stop a conventional Warsaw Pact attack. Thus, NATO has to improve its conventional posture if it is to delay the early use of nuclear weapons and increase its ability to sustain a conventional defense.

INF DEPLOYMENT AND ARMS CONTROL

It is critically important that the Atlantic Alliance continue to maintain a united front on arms control, particularly as a new round of arms control negotiations may be approaching. This also means that NATO must hold to the scheduled deployment of Pershing II and cruise missiles. Since their suspension of the INF talks, the Soviets have continued to deploy SS-20 missiles. More importantly, the Soviets have continued deployment since the Dutch government in June 1984 decided to delay their own decision on cruise missile deployment until November 1985. This demonstrates that the Soviets are not going to fulfill the freeze on SS-20 deployment which the Dutch stated as one of their conditions.

Still, the United States must continue to explore the prospects of arms control negotiations with the Soviets on INF. This is not only because arms control is important to world security, it is also because the United States must preserve the trust of our allies and our own citizens who expect the United States to continue to follow the terms of the 1979 "dual track" decision and the May, 1984 NATO statement on East-West relations which urge such negotiations.

NON-NATO REGIONS

The dependency of NATO members, especially those in Western Europe, on outside energy sources and the growing inter-relationships of foreign policy problems throughout the world make it necessary for the United States and Western Europe to continue to investigate ways to coordinate policy, including military strategy, and to assist one another where possible. It is true that some European nations face constitutional problems when sending troops beyond borders, but such conditions should not preclude examination of ways for European forces to replace U.S. troops who may have to be redeployed outside of Europe. Likewise, we should build on the type of cooperation found recently in Lebanon, the Persian Gulf, and the Red Sea among the United States and some of its European allies.

ECONOMIC COOPERATION

Much of NATO's present difficulty is underscored and exacerbated by economic problems. These issues are being discussed at other times during our two days of meetings, but the United States and its European friends would all agree that a healthier world economy, lower budget deficits, and faster rates of growth in Europe would make discussion of NATO's needs much easier. Consequently, we must work together on policies which will promote sustained economic growth rather than revisiting the economic nationalism of the 1930's which led to such tragic destruction in World War II.

The United States and the Congress continue to place the highest importance on our close relationship with the nations of Western Europe. It is the maintenance of the Atlantic Alliance and our economic and commercial ties which has helped preserve our security for over 30 years and will continue to do so in the future. This is why many in the Congress are so concerned about the health of NATO and of our broader political and economic relations. We believe all countries involved must take actions to resolve some of the problems facing NATO. If the Congress sees actions taken on some of these concerns, I do not believe Western Europe will have to fear the passage of a Nunn-Roth amendment or the creation of a more independent foreign policy in the United States.●

INTRODUCTION OF THE KEMP-KASTEN FAIR AND SIMPLE TAX [FAST]

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, today, together with Senator ROBERT KASTEN of Wisconsin I am reintroducing our tax reform bill called the Fair and Simple Tax [FAST].

Since we introduced our first tax reform bill, we have been continually working to improve it, especially by looking for ways to reduce the tax disincentives facing low and middle income families, to enhance investment incentives, to increase the rewards for entrepreneurship and risk-taking, and to meet our goals of essential revenue and distributional neutrality.

We have not changed the basic strengths of the original Kemp-Kasten modified flat tax: We lower marginal tax rates, dramatically reduce the number of tax brackets, double the personal exemption to increase fairness for families, raise the income tax threshold above the poverty line to help break the poverty cycle, greatly simplify the Tax Code, eliminate many deductions and loopholes that distort economic activity, and make sure that all Americans pay their fair share.

While we have kept the major outlines of the original Kemp-Kasten bill, there are some changes which we believe are significant.

PERSONAL RATE STRUCTURE

The first significant change is in the income tax rates for individuals. We have lowered our flat rate on taxable income to 24 percent from 25 percent. This change will affect middle and lower income Americans. Since Kemp-Kasten contains an employment income exclusion of one-fifth of all employment income below $41,700 a year (the social security wage base), the effective marginal tax rate on those earning below about $40,000 will now be 19 percent.

The employment income exclusion is now phased in so that everyone earning above about $40,000 yearly pays an effective marginal tax rate of about 29 percent. This preserves the ability-to-pay principle. And compared to our earlier bill, this change will result in a more continuous combined income and payroll tax rate at all income levels.

CAPITAL GAINS

We know that low capital gains taxes are crucial for risk taking, entrepreneurship, venture capital formation, new stock offerings, and new business starts. Yet we realize that there are two different types of investors who require different types of capital gains treatment. Investors seeking high growth prefer a large capital gains exclusion and are relatively indifferent to inflation indexing. Long-term investors looking for a relatively low rate of return need indexing protection against inflation; the current code does not include indexing, an omission which results in real taxes on phony, inflated gains.

To meet the legitimate needs of both types of investors, we permanently allow two options for capital gains. In any year an investor may either first, have all capital gains indexed for inflation and taxed as ordinary income, or second, without the benefit of indexing, 40 percent of the gain can be excluded from taxation, which cuts the top rate to 17 percent. Corporations have a similar choice between indexing and 35 percent rates, or no indexing and a capital gains rate of 20 percent.

DEPRECIATION

Our new bill contains a corporate and business depreciation system that should significantly increase incentives for new investment. Many tax experts favor expensing of capital investment because it treats all assets and industries alike, avoiding the Tax Code favoring some industries and punishing others. Expensing also virtually eliminates the distortions caused by inflation on corporate capital. These distortions arise because under historical cost accounting the corporate tax system can actually tax corporate capital rather than the return to capital. And expensing eliminates the double tax on corporate income.

However, one major problem has been that pure expensing involves large revenue losses in the first year, trailing off in later years, after which it raises money compared to current law. Some experts suggest phasing in expensing or keeping corporate tax rates very high to offset the short-term revenue loss. But long phase-in periods could cause business and other investors to delay their investment to receive the best tax treatment.

To avoid revenue loss while preserving the long-term economic advantage of expensing, the Kemp-Kasten bill modifies the current law depreciation schedules. It moderately stretches out the number of years of depreciation writeoff, increases the total depreciation writeoff, and indexes depreciation allowances for inflation. This gives the full economic value of expensing for all capital investment assuming a 3.5 percent real rate of return (this is slightly above the average postwar rate). Combined with cutting the corporate rate to 35 percent, the new depreciation system greatly reduces the cost of investment capital and will help assure that investment dollars are channeled to the most efficient projects.

CORPORATE INCOME TAX RATES

The new Kemp-Kasten bill lowers the corporate rate from 46 percent to 35 percent, which will greatly reduce double taxation of corporate dividends, lessen the relative advantage of tax-deductible debt financing, and ameliorate the anti-investment bias in our Tax Code. However, the top corporate rate remains slightly higher than the top rate for individuals. Kemp-Kasten also recognizes the important role for small business by including a 15 percent rate on all business income below $50,000 and a 25 percent on income up to $100,000 a year.

SOCIAL SECURITY

The new Kemp-Kasten bill uses a different method to lessen the taxation of Social Security benefits. We reduce taxation from one-half to one-quarter of Social Security benefits for income earners above $32,000 joint ($25,000 single). As in our previous bill, we phase out the so-called earnings test, by which retirees lose 50 cents in Social Security benefits for every dollar of earnings above a threshold.

We are excited by our new plan because it brings even closer the goals which we set for ourselves in the original Kemp-Kasten bill: tax simplicity, efficiency, and fairness. And by increasing economic incentives, plugging loopholes, and spurring economic growth, the Kemp-Kasten bill will also make a power contribution to deficit reduction, even though the measure itself is designed to be revenue neutral in a static sense.

The American people know that the current system is in disarray. The President strongly supports tax reform and Congressmen of both parties understand the popular yearning for change. To symbolize the spirit of bipartisan support for tax simplification, Senator BRADLEY and Congressman GEPHARDT are also introducing their tax reform plan in Congress on this same day. As Senator KASTEN and I have said on many occasions, we welcome the contribution that Senator BRADLEY and Congressman GEPHARDT have made to lower marginal tax rates, increase investment incentives, and simplify the Tax Code. This kind of support from our Democratic colleagues signals Congress and the administration that the movement for comprehensive tax reform is building undeniable momentum and strength.

The bipartisan support in Congress simply reflects the public's overwhelming support for tax simplification, lower tax rates, and fairness. According to a New York Times poll, almost 95 percent of the American public feel that the present tax system is unfair to the ordinary working man or woman. By almost 2 to 1, the public favors proposals to simplify the tax system by reducing the tax rate and the number of special tax preferences. According to a Washington Post/ABC News poll, over 60 percent of the public believes that tax rates are just too high.

We disagree with the special interests who want tax reform to wait. Tax simplification should not be put on the back burner or studied to death; it is absolutely essential in 1985 to deepen and expand our economic recovery and provide opportunity to every one who wants a job. Comprehensive tax reform to help create full employment without inflation must be enacted this year.

EXPLANATION BY CONGRESSMAN JACK KEMP, REPUBLICAN OF NEW YORK, OF THE KEMP-KASTEN FAIR AND SIMPLE TAX

The "Fair and Simple Tax" (FAST) plan, which I have introduced, is a comprehensive proposal designed to bring about a simpler, fairer, and more efficient tax code, with greater after-tax incentives for work, saving and investment.

Our current income tax code is now too complex, too encrusted with special provisions, and its tax rates are too high, to be either fair or efficient in raising revenues. Many provisions intended to protect families, like the personal exemption, have been eaten away by years of inflation.

The Fair and Simple Tax is unique in combining the simplicity of a flat income tax on taxable income with a progressive tax base. The plan eliminates many tax preferences or "loopholes" and imposes a flat tax rate, but also provides generous protection for families with children, homeowners, workers, senior citizens, and the poor.

FAST doubles the personal exemption to $2,000, and retains important deductions such as mortgage interest, charitable contributions, real property taxes, and catastrophic medical expenses. Also retained are the current tax treatment of retirement annuities (such as IRAs, Keoghs, and company pensions) and veterans' benefits.

Kemp-Kasten introduces a new exclusion to protect wage earners, the working poor, and retired citizens. For wage earners, the exclusion is 20% of employment income up to about $42,000, and is phased out entirely at about $84,000. This new exclusion lowers the effective income tax rate and offsets the Social Security payroll tax, resulting in a smooth, almost flat total tax rate. Taxpayers with employment income of less than $10,000 (single) or $15,000 (joint return) may exclude 20% of any income up to those amounts, regardless of its source. After deducting the generous personal allowances and employment income exclusion, all taxable income is taxed at the same 24% tax rate.

As a result of Kemp-Kasten's generous allowances, Americans near or below the poverty level would no longer pay income tax under FAST. For example, the income at which people start paying income tax in 1985 would rise from $3,430 to $5,750 for a single taxpayer, and from $8,936 to $14,125 for a family of four. This lifts the income tax threshold above the poverty line, which is $5,517 for a single person and $11,101 for a family of four. More than a million of the lowest-income taxpayers are removed from the tax rolls. And FAST helps millions more to get out of the "poverty trap" of steep disincentives caused by a combination of high tax rates and means-tested social welfare payments.

For taxpayers in general, the FAST tax is designed to raise about the same amount of revenue in each income class as under current law. However, because many tax preferences are eliminated, most taxpayers whose deductions are no greater than average would receive a tax cut. For example, a nonitemizing family of four earning $20,000 would receive a tax cut of $497.

FAST increases incentives, too. Today's top income tax rate is cut almost in half, from 50% to 28%. FAST indexes the tax code for inflation, including the personal exemption, the zero-bracket amounts, the employment income exclusion, and the earned income credit. This prevents automatic tax increases caused by inflation, which hit lower and middle incomes the hardest. The poor and working poor would be permanently protected from inflation. For the first time, capital gains are indexed for inflation, to end the taxation of phony, inflated gains on assets like stocks or houses.

On the corporate side, most tax preferences are repealed, and the top tax rate is cut from 46% to 35%, with a reduced rate of 15% for small businesses. The new depreciation schedules enacted in 1981 are modified to be equivalent in economic terms to expensing. An expensing provision for small business is retained. Corporations may choose between treating capital gains as ordinary income, with indexing of capital basis, or a flat 20% tax rate without indexing.

With its simplicity, protection for families and the poor, and increased incentives to work, save and invest, the Fair and Simple Tax is a plan which families across the country can embrace.

THE KEMP-KASTEN FAIR AND SIMPLE TAX [FAST]

General Description

After deducting generous personal allowances and employment income exclusion, all taxable income is taxed at a reduced rate of 24%:

Kemp-Kasten eliminates most deductions, credits, exemptions, exclusions except:

Personal allowances: Personal exemption doubled to $2,000 for each taxpayer, spouse, and dependent below age 19; extra $2,000 exemption for elderly, blind and disabled; zero-bracket amounts (standard deduction) of $2,600 single, $2,700 head of household, $3,300 joint; and indexes for inflation the personal exemption, zero-bracket amounts, earned income credit.

New exclusion for earned and unearned income: Excludes 20% of gross wage, salary, and self-employment income up to Social Security wage base ($41,700 in 1986, and indexed by law); phased out to result in a maximum effective marginal tax rate of about 28%; and for those with employment income of less than $10,000 (single) or $15,000 (joint return), excludes 20% of any income from taxation, regardless of its source, up to those amounts; this is designed to protect those who live mostly from saving and pension income rather than wages.

Retains deductions for: Charitable contributions; interest on mortgages and loans for education and investments; real property taxes; and medical expenses above 10% of adjusted gross income.

Treatment of capital gains and losses: Taxpayers may choose between full taxation of gains, with basis indexed for inflation from date of enactment, or excluding 40% of gains and losses (17% top rate) without indexing; current homeowner's rollover and one-time exclusion is retained; and six-month holding period made permanent.

Retains current treatment of: Retirement annuities (IRAs, Keoghs [H.R. 10], Social Security [improved treatment], corporate pensions); military and veterans benefits; employer-provided benefits (such as health, life insurance premiums); foreign source income; earned income credit (slightly modified); general obligation tax-exempt bonds; employee business expenses and moving expenses; ordinary business expenses.

Corporate Income Tax

Reduced rate of 35% applied to the following tax base:

Kemp-Kasten eliminates most deductions, credits, exemptions, exclusions except: deduction listed above, if applicable, e.g., charitable contributions; ordinary business expenses; capital gains treatment: either full taxation with indexing, or a reduced 20% rate without indexing; foreign income tax credit; small business provisions: 15% tax rate up to $50,000 taxable income; 25% rate for $50,000 to $100,000 taxable income, expensing for up to $10,000 of business property; Neutral Cost Recovery System (NCRS): current-law capital cost recovery schedules are modified to provide the economic equivalent of expensing, and indexed for inflation.

THE KEMP-KASTEN FAIR AND SIMPLE TAX [FAST] SUMMARY OF EFFECTS OF THE EMPLOYMENT INCOME EXCLUSION

A distinctive feature of the Kemp-Kasten "Fair and Simple Tax" (FAST) is a new "up-front" or "above-the-line" exclusion for part of wages and salaries: the employment income exclusion. In general, taxpayers may exclude 20% of wage and salary income, up to the Social Security wage base (which is $41,700) in 1986, and indexed by law).

Two exceptions are permitted for the sake of fairness. First, taxpayers with less than $10,000 (single) or $15,000 (joint return) in wages and salaries may exclude 20% of all gross income, up to those amounts. This especially helps retired senior citizens. Second, two-earner couples with combined wages and salaries in excess of the Social Security wage base may figure their exclusions separately and add the two.

The exclusion is phased out by adding back 20% of a taxpayer's income in excess of the Social Security wage base. This phases out the exclusion completely for incomes greater than twice the Social Security wage base (about $83,000 in 1986). Above this point, the phaseout acts as a surtax which equalizes the tax rate for upper-bracket taxpayers at about 28%.

This provision has several advantages:

First, it protects the poorest individuals and families, by raising the threshold at which they start paying income tax. For example, under Kemp-Kasten the personal exemptions and standard deduction allowed for a family of four total $11,300. The wage exclusion raises the tax-free level of income further, to $14,125. (The income tax threshold is less than $9,000 under current law; the official poverty level is more than $11,000 in 1985.)

Second, for low- and middle-income taxpayers, the exclusion offsets most of the Social Security payroll tax rate. Without such a provision, there can be significantly higher combined marginal tax rates (Social Security plus income tax) below the Social Security wage base than above it. The FAST plan fixes the problem. (The marginal tax rate is the tax on an additional dollar of income.)

Third, the exclusion results in smooth, virtually flat total marginal tax rates both below and above the Social Security wage base. It equalizes the tax rates on employment and savings income. And compared with a "pure flat" income tax, the exclusion reduces the tax burden for all wages and salaries less than about $80,000.

Finally, the employment income exclusion helps keep the distribution of the income tax burden virtually unchanged in each income class, right up to the point at which the exclusion disappears. This makes FAST fairer than a straight flat rate tax, while remaining almost as simple.

TREATMENT OF TAXPAYERS BELOW OR NEAR THE POVERTY LEVEL

Under current law, many taxpayers living below the poverty level pay federal income taxes. Under the Kemp-Kasten "Fair and Simple Tax" (FAST), however, no working family or single taxpayer below the poverty line would pay any federal income tax.

FAST also extends similar protection to "the working poor"—families with incomes of up to about 130% of the poverty level. In this way, about a million and a half taxpayers near or below the poverty level would be removed from the tax rolls entirely.

This is because three features of the FAST proposal combine to increase the income threshold at which taxpayers begin to pay Federal income tax: the doubled personal exemption, the zero bracket amounts (standard deductions), and the new exclusion for employment income.

What is just as important, the FAST plan makes sure that this protection will always exist in the future. Under FAST, the personal exemption, the zero bracket amounts, and the employment income exclusion are all indexed to keep up with inflation.

TREATMENT OF OLDER AMERICANS

One of the most exciting features of FAST is its elimination of certain disincentives in current law which disproportionately affect older citizens.

FAST increases the total size of exemptions for older individuals and the blind from $2,000 to $4,000 each, and the exemptions are indexed to keep their full value.

Taxpayers also may exclude 20% of the first $10,000 (single) or $15,000 (joint return) of any income from taxation, regardless of its source. These amounts are indexed for inflation. This provision is designed to protect those who live mostly from savings income rather than wages (which receive a 20% exclusion under Kemp-Kasten up to about $40,000).

FAST slashes what Forbes magazine has called "the 96% bracket" for America's older citizens. That is, under current law an ill-conceived combination of federal programs result in marginal tax rates on the elderly which can range from 80% to more than 100%.

These high tax rates under current law are caused by an interaction of the following factors:

(1) The so-called "retirement test" reduces Social Security benefits by 50 cents for every $1 above $7,320 a year of income earned by those between the ages of 65 and 70. This creates, in effect, a 50% marginal tax rate on earned income.

(2) The 1983 Social Security amendments effectively raise the federal marginal tax rate by 50% above what it would otherwise be. This provision adds 50 cents in Social Security benefits to a taxpayer's tax base for every dollar of income earned above a certain income "threshold." For example, if a taxpayer is in the 30% federal income tax bracket under current law, the "threshold" method can effectively raise the marginal income tax rate to 45%.

(3) Such workers must also pay ordinary federal, state and local income and payroll taxes.

Kemp-Kasten eliminates this "96% bracket":

(a) FAST liberalizes the retirement test, by cutting the benefit reduction from 50 cents to 25 cents on a dollar immediately, and to zero after five years.

(b) FAST reduces the marginal tax rates on Social Security benefits by reducing the taxable amount from 50 cents to 25 cents per dollar of additional income.

This combination of improvements would reduce that "96% tax bracket" on middle-income older Americans by almost two-thirds.

THE NEUTRAL COST RECOVERY SYSTEM [NCRS]: CAPITAL COST RECOVERY UNDER KEMP-KASTEN

The Kemp-Kasten "Fair and Simple Tax" (FAST) modifies the current-law Accelerated Cost Recovery System (ACRS) to provide the economic equivalent of investment expensing—the Neutral Cost Recovery System (NCRS).

The ACRS depreciation classes are retained. The depreciation allowances are indexed for inflation. The class lives are slightly lengthened and the total nominal writeoffs are increased to provide the present value of expensing. For example, the 5-year writeoff for machinery is lengthened to 6 years under NCRS, but the total depreciation allowance is increased from 100 to 110 percent of the initial investment (plus inflation-indexing). This is equivalent to expensing at a 3.5% real rate of return, which is slightly above the postwar average. [NCRS is more favorable than ACRS depreciation for real interest rates up to 24% (3-year property) or 48% (5-year property).]

NCRS is neutral with respect to long-lived and short-lived investments, unlike current law. It is also neutral with respect to the relative value of capital assets and consumption goods. And an expensing-equivalent depreciation schedule effectively eliminates the double tax on corporate income.

NCRS avoids a drawback of pure expensing: a large up-front revenue loss which could be recouped only in later years. Though the cost of capital is lower under NCRS than under current-law schedules, NCRS is not "front-loaded" like ACRS, and should raise corporate tax receipts for several years.

Aside from instituting NCRS, Kemp-Kasten repeals most corporate tax preferences, including the investment tax credit, and cuts the top corporate tax rate from 46% to 35%.

A SALUTE TO THE CITY OF CLEVELAND HEIGHTS, OHIO

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to share some exciting news about the city of Cleveland Heights, OH, with my colleagues. For my colleagues who have never been to Cleveland Heights, I can only say that you have missed a great experience.

It is a delightful place to visit. It is picturesque. Its cultural diversity is fascinating. More importantly, it is an ideal place to live and work. The fact that the city has been named an All-American City twice in the last 10 years is a tribute to the leaders and people of this community. In addition to this honor, numerous magazine articles have appeared detailing the fine schools, housing, job opportunities, architecture and cultural diversity of Cleveland Heights, OH.

Mr. Speaker. I am proud to represent the people of Cleveland Heights, OH, here in the Congress. I am even more proud of the way the citizens of Cleveland Heights have made their community an ideal place to live.

Accordingly, I would like to insert in the RECORD an article which appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer on January 20, 1985, on the city of Cleveland Heights. I ask my colleagues to join me in saluting the leaders and citizens of this community.

DIVERSE CLEVELAND HEIGHTS—PUTTING ALL THAT TOGETHER AND MAKING IT WORK

(By George E. Jordan)

Cleveland Heights has spirit. It's the smell in incense and hand-tooled leather in Coventry, Jewish bakeries on Taylor Rd. and foreign coffee in eateries in dozens of unassuming storefronts.

It's small-town neighborliness, people who take extreme pride in home and family and practice aggressive, grass-roots politics as a way of life.

It's an arts festival or play in Cain Park, a block club party, street fair or jazz concert. Perhaps a stroll along street after street of well-tended apartments, condominiums, modest homes and vintage estates.

It's a place where the overwhelming majority of 56,438 young and old, black and white, rich and not so rich citizens at the gateway to the eastern suburbs reflect tolerance and good will.

"This is the most cosmopolitan community in Cuyahoga County and in northeast Ohio," said Councilman Barbara H. Boyd. "Cleveland Heights is a strong and active community. It's hard to describe. You're talking a city of communities and much diversity."

Cleveland Heights' schools, housing stock, businesses and amenities of life have earned it praise from cities across the country.

Its complex diversity and communal spirit did not evolve by chance.

Today's Cleveland Heights—chic, vibrant, progressive—is perhaps most directly the result of pro-integration activism and a commitment to commercial and residential development beginning in the mid-1960s.

In the early 1800s, it was a farming community called Turkey Ridge, which later became a haven for the wealthy who wanted to be close to the Rockefeller and Severance families on "millionaire's row."

In the early 1900s, small businesses sprang up and slate-roofed Tudors and other stylish homes began popping up along heavily wooded avenues and up Cedar Hill. A town hall was built on Mayfield Rd. in 1923, and a sizable Orthodox Jewish community developed in the Taylor Rd.-Washington Blvd. area.

By the early 1960s, blacks and other minorities began to move there in growing numbers. As of the last census, 27% of the population was non-white.

In 1965, a black family's house was firebombed in Cleveland Heights. The city's elected officials and community leaders, taken aback by the racially motivated incident, adopted a hold posture.

They issued statements welcoming minorities and rallied residents to get involved in government, know their neighbors and accept social change. They began monitoring real estate practices to fight resegregation of any of the city's well-defined neighborhoods.

By the mid-1970s, a tight housing market and an interest in older homes—two factors over which the city had no control—slowed the flight of white homeowners.

But leading the way against fear and tension were groups like the Heights Community Congress, a housing watchdog agency; the Cuyahoga Plan of Ohio Inc.; and the Jewish Community Federation's Heights Area Project.

At the same time, city government began a historical landmarks commission, organizing neighborhood groups and a massive streets, sewers and parks improvement project. The school system, which serves neighboring University Heights, embarked on a multimillion-dollar renovation effort.

That commitment to open housing, good schools, neighborhood activism and economic development led in 1976 and 1978 to All-America City awards from the National Municipal League.

"The total diversity is what makes Cleveland Heights the great place that it is. Integration is a positive experience," observed Lana Cowell, executive director of the Heights Community Congress.

"You find a lot of diversity in every neighborhood of Cleveland Heights," said Susan Burkons, real estate programs coordinator for the city. "The unique thing about Cleveland Heights is that conceivably you could never leave it and live a full life . . . It's a great place to raise kids. It's an education they're not aware of."

"What it really is," said newly appointed City Manager Robert C. Downey, Jr., "is putting all that together and making it work."

Downey, 31, becomes the city's chief executive tomorrow, when City Manager Richard V. Robinson formally relinquishes his post to become manager of Lakewood, Colo.

Under Robinson, appointed in 1975, the city embarked on several development projects, such as a systematic sewer and streets repair program and computerization of the city's finance department, which took over income tax collections at a savings from the Regional Income Tax Agency.

The city recently broke ground for a new $6 million municipal center adjacent to Severance Center.

Robinson helped expand the Local Development Corporation, a non-profit volunteer group that grants rebates to businesses for storefront renovations. Another city program, the commercial area improvement fund, concentrates on landscaping in business districts.

"It's very grass roots and nuts and bolts, but if he (Robinson) hadn't been involved, we wouldn't have had our commercial areas looking so attractive," said Marcia Nolan, assistant city manager for economic development.

"We want development, but we're not just going to take anything. It has to fit Cleveland Heights. It has to have a Cleveland Heights flavor," she said. "We want businesses that fit into our community, and they can prosper if they fit."

Attempts to uphold the Heights image in city planning, zoning and legislative initiatives, have prompted protests from some merchants and community groups. They contend the highly regulatory city government, particularly with Robinson's emphasis on long-range planning, is unresponsive to its citizens.

The focal point of their dissent is a series of strict housing codes enacted last year that, among other things, give inspectors the power to obtain search warrants to enter private homes for inspections. Repeated code violators can be fined and even jailed.

A group gathering signatures on initiative petitions hopes to call a special election this year on three proposed charter amendments that would change the form of government to an elected mayor and seven-member council elected by wards. The proposed amendments would require a popular vote on all zoning issues.

"The government is not being responsive to the people out here," said Frank M. Vitale, a petition drive supporter. "We, in a sense, want the city to be accountable, and we want the total community to decide what form of government we want. The city manager form of government has outlived itself."

Cleveland Heights, Bedford and East Cleveland are the only municipalities governed by a council/manager government in Cuyahoga County. This fall, Cleveland Heights voters are to choose among candidates for four of seven council seats.

"I think it's a bad idea," Robinson said of the proposed charter amendments. "It could cause a lot of frustration. I think the council manager form of government provides a responsiveness."

He emphasized elected mayors have the authority to veto legislation, which weakens the authority of councilmen.

Beginning in 1922, with adoption of the city charter, until the mid-1960s, strict zoning laws to control and prompt steady growth have been a recurring theme within Cleveland Heights' 8.1 square miles.

Coventry, in its early days, belonged to the carriage trade. Shoppers were brought to their destination by chauffeurs. Other businesses sprang up along Lee Rd., trolley cars lumbered along Fairmount Blvd.'s center strip and streetcars traveled on Cedar Rd.

Frank C. Cain, mayor for 36 years, spearheaded construction in the 1930s of a 3,000-seat theater in Cain Park, a 23-acre wooded ravine later named in his honor. The partially enclosed Alam Theater in the same park, near Superior Rd. between Lee and Taylor roads, was erected a few years later.

Besides summer weekend jazz concerts and impressive stage productions, Cain Park is the site of a nationally acclaimed arts festival in which as many as 30,000 entries compete to be among 100 works placed on display.

As land for new developments began to disappear, Cleveland Heights became a more stable community. In 1970, for example, nearly 70% of the people who lived there owned their homes, and the apartment vacancy rate was less than 1%.

In the midst of such stability, Coventry's heyday as an island of free expression for children of the baby boom was drawing to a close.

"It's matured," said Cowell. "It's become a much more family-oriented neighborhood, much more conservative. But conservative in Cleveland Heights is probably much more left than in some neighborhoods."

Hippies, flower children, motorcycle gangs, long hair and tattered clothes, exotic novelties and the smell of marijuana are no longer the rule on the sidewalks between Mayfield Rd. and Euclid Heights Blvd.

Even Coventry Neighbors Inc.'s 12-year-old summer street fair may be canceled this year because it was getting too unwieldy. Its fate will be decided at a meeting tomorrow.

"I think there is a basic continuity between Coventry and the rest of Cleveland Heights," said David Burwasser, a longtime community activist and self-professed gadfly. "Coventry is a place that's best wrapped up in the word 'latitude,' a willingness to tolerate behavior by others that is not immediately harmful to one's self."

If Coventry does make a statement about present-day Cleveland Heights, perhaps the buzzwords would be atmospheric and avant-garde, designer jeans, wine and cheese and Epicurean delights.●

THE TRUTH IN MILEAGE ACT OF 1985

HON. JOHN BRYANT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, today's consumer in the market for a used car or truck is likely to pay between $750 and $1,000 more for the vehicle if it has been the target of one of the fastest growing consumer frauds—odometer tampering. A conservative estimate is that each year the odometers of more than 3 million vehicles are rolled back as much as 30,000 miles or more. The cost to American consumers is in excess of $2 billion.

Odometer tampering is difficult to detect, however, so the real amount of loss suffered by used car buyers could be much higher.

Today we are introducing legislation to help eliminate this extensive fraudulent practice. Our proposal will enable law enforcement officers and the general public to more readily detect and identify those vehicles which have altered odometers.

Briefly, this bill provides that:

1. Following the sale of a motor vehicle from one person to another, such vehicle may not be registered or licensed for use in any State unless:

(a) The seller discloses on his title certificate the true odometer reading as of the date of sale, and;

(b) The application by the new owner of the vehicle for a certificate of title is accompanied by the prior owner's most recent vehicle registration card.

2. No registration card may be issued in any State unless the application includes the odometer reading on the vehicle as of the date of the application.

3. The State must take the odometer reading shown on the application and include it as part of the new registration card.

4. The certificate of title issued by the State to the new owner must indicate the odometer reading as of the day of transfer (printed on the title) and the title must be printed in bank note intaglio printing process.

5. In addition, the certificate of title must contain a space for the disclosure of the odometer reading when the car is sold in the future.

6. All auction companies are required to maintain the following records for all cars sold at their auctions:

(a) The name of the seller and the name of the buyer of the motor vehicle;

(b) The vehicle identification number of the vehicle, and;

(c) The odometer reading on the date on which the auction company took possession of the vehicle.

7. Maximum criminal penalties are increased from one year to three years.

8. Maximum civil penalties are increased from $1,000 to $2,000 per violation.

9. The Secretary of Transportation is granted the authority to approve alternative methods of complying with the requirements of the Act upon application from a state, if such alternative compliance method is consistent with the purposes of the act.

Reputable new and used car dealers, as well as consumer groups have expressed support for this legislation. I encourage all my colleagues in the House to join TOM TAUKE and myself in supporting this proposal by cosponsoring the Truth in Mileage Act of 1985.

For your information, the text of the bill follows:

H.R. 780

A bill to amend section 408 of the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act to strengthen, for the protection of consumers, the provisions respecting disclosure of motor vehicle mileage when motor vehicles are transferred

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. AMENDMENT OF MOTOR VEHICLE INFORMATION AND COST SAVINGS ACT.

(a) TRANSFERS OF MOTOR VEHICLES.—Section 408 of the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act (15 U.S.C. 1988) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

(d)(1) The purpose of the requirements of paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of this subsection is to discourage tampering of odometers in the transfer of motor vehicles and to protect consumers in such transfers.

(2) No motor vehicle, registered or licensed before any transfer subject to this subsection, the ownership of which is transferred by any person to another person in interstate commerce may be registered or licensed for use by the transferee in any State or used by the transferee in interstate commerce, unless the transferee of such motor vehicle in submitting an application to a State for the certificate of title upon which such registration or license will be issued includes with such application—

(A) the transferor's most recent registration card for such motor vehicle; and

(B) the transferor's title and, if that title contains the space referred to in paragraph (2)(C), a statement, signed and dated by the transferror, of the mileage required to be disclosed by the transferor under subsection (a).

To assist in the implementation of this paragraph, each State shall require in the case of a transfer of a motor vehicle in the State that the transferor provide the transferee with the transferor's registration card for the motor vehicle transferred.

(3) No motor vehicle the ownership of which is transferred by any person to another person in interstate commerce may be registered or licensed for use in any State or used in interstate commerce, unless the certificate of title (or other document indicating ownership) of such motor vehicle which is issued by a State to the transferee following such transfer—

"(A) is printed in bank note intaglio printing process;

"(B) indicates on its face the mileage required to be disclosed by the tranferor under subsection (a); and

"(C) contains a space for the transferee to disclose (in the event of a future sale or other transfer of title by such transferee) the mileage at the time of such future transfer and to sign and date such disclosures.

"(4) No registration card may be issued in any State for any motor vehicle used in interstate commerce unless—

"(A) the application for such registration card contains the information required by subsection (a), determined as of the date on which such application is submitted by the owner of the motor vehicle; and

"(B) such registration card contains the information provided in such application under subparagraph (A).

"(5) The requirements of paragraphs (3) and (4) that a State issue a certificate of title or registration for a motor vehicle which contains mileage information for the motor vehicle does not require the State to verify, or preclude the State from verifying, the mileage information contained in the certificate of title or registration.

"(6) Any State in which, on the date of the enactment of this subsection, there is in effect requirements respecting the disclosure of motor vehicle mileage when motor vehicles are transferred may submit to the Secretary such requirements for approval in lieu of the requirements of this subsection. The Secretary may promulgate regulations establishing procedures for the consideration and approval of such alternative requirements. Such alternative requirements shall be approved by the Secretary unless the Secretary determines that under such alternative requirements there is not substantial compliance with the requirements of this subsection. Any modification of approved alternative requirements must be approved by the Secretary. Upon the termination of approved alternative requirements of a State, the requirements of this subsection shall take effect in such State.

"(e) If any motor vehicle is sold at an auction, the auction company which conducts such auction shall establish and maintain for a period of at least 4 years following the date of such sale the following records:

"(1) The name of the most recent owner of the motor vehicle (other than the auction company) and the name of the buyer of the motor vehicle.

"(2) The vehicle identification number of the motor vehicle.

"(3) The odometer reading on the date on which the auction company took possession of the motor vehicle.".

(b) DEFINITION.—Section 402 of the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act (15 U.S.C. 1982) is amended by adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(6) The term 'auction company' means any person who takes possession (whether through consignment or bailment or through any other arrangement) of a motor vehicle owned by another person for purposes of selling such motor vehicle at an auction."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATES.—(1) Except as provided in paragraph (3), paragraphs (2) and (3) of section 408(d) of the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act (15 U.S.C. 1988), as added by subsection (a) of this section, shall apply with respect to motor vehicles which are transferred after the date 30 months after the date of enactment of this Act.

(2) Except as provided in paragraph (3), paragraph (4) of such section, as added by subsection (a) of this section, shall apply with respect to motor vehicles which are registered in any State after the date 30 months after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(3) Subsection (e) of such section, as added by subsection (a) of this section, shall apply with respect to motor vehicles which are sold by an auction company after the date 30 months after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(4) The Secretary of Transportation shall, upon application, assist a State in revising its laws to comply with the requirements of paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of section 408(d) of the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act. If any State requires time, in addition to the period prescribed by paragraph (1) or (2) of this subsection, to revise its laws to achieve such compliance, the Secretary may, upon the request of such State, grant, by notice published in the Federal Register, the State such reasonable additional time as the Secretary determines is necessary to achieve such compliance. The Secretary shall include in the Federal Register notice the reasons for granting additional time. In granting additional time, the Secretary shall ensure that the State is making reasonable effort to achieve such compliance.

(5) For purposes of this subsection, the terms "motor vehicle" and "auction company" shall have the same meanings as when used in the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act (15 U.S.C. 1901 et seq.).

SEC. 2. PENALTIES.

(a) CIVIL PENALTY.—Section 412(a) of the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act (15 U.S.C. 1990c) is amended by striking out "$1,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$2,000".

(b) CRIMINAL PENALTY.—Section 413(a) of the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act (15 U.S.C. 1990c) is amended by striking out "not more than one year," and inserting in lieu thereof "not more than three years,".●

THE IRISH KIDS BILL

HON. PAT WILLIAMS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in the book, "Children of War," the author states:

There are places in the world like Northern Ireland * * * that have been at war for the past 20 years or more. Therefore, the children living in these places have known nothing but war in their experience * * * (and) * * * Everything they feel and sense occurs in a situation where their lives may be ruined any moment.

Because the Irish children of "the troubles" lead such different lives from our children and have little opportunity to know about peace, TOM FOLEY and I are introducing a bill which, if enacted, would provide all Americans the opportunity to help children from war-torn Northern Ireland to live and learn in America for a year-long respite from violence and fear.

Our bill would amend subchapter C, the special projects section, of chapter 2 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Block Grant. It would provide an option to local education agencies to offer a chance to these children to attend American schools, to associate with children from various religious, ethnic, social, and cultural backgrounds, and to experience life without the daily threat of violence.

Funds under this act would be used to pay a portion of the cost of:

(1) Transporting children age 10 through 18 who reside in areas affected by civil strife in Ireland to the United States, and their return,

(2) Such children's education in the schools of the local education agency concerned, and

(3) The books, supplies, clothing, and other living expenses of such children while they are participating in the project.

I hope my colleagues will join with TOM FOLEY and me in sponsoring and passing this legislation.

The text of the bill follows:

A bill to provide an experience of life in the United States to children from areas affected by civil strife in Ireland by permitting the use of education block grant funds

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subchapter C of chapter 2 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: "projects for Irish children

"SEC. 582A. (a) It is the purpose of this section to permit funds available under this subchapter to be used to provide an opportunity to live in the United States to children from areas of Ireland that have been torn by civil strife and violence. Such opportunity should include attendance in American schools and affiliation with children of diverse religious, ethnic, cultural, and social backgrounds in a peaceful atmosphere.

"(b) Funds available under this subchapter may be used for projects for Irish children in accordance with this section if the local educational agency concerned files with the Secretary a plan which contains—

"(1) assurances that such funds will be used in accordance with subsection (c);

"(2) assurances that not less than one-half the cost of such projects will be provided from private donations; and

"(3) such other information as the Secretary may by regulation require.

"(c) Funds available for purposes of this section may be used only—

"(1) to pay a portion of the cost of transporting children aged ten through eighteen who reside in areas affected by civil strife in Ireland to the United States and of their return;

"(2) to pay a portion of the cost of such children's education in the schools of the local education concerned; and

"(3) to pay a portion of the books, supplies, clothing, and other living expenses of such children while they are participating in the project.".

(b) Section 582 of such subchapter is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (2);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(4) projects for Irish children in accordance with section 582A.".●

IT IS TIME TO STOP HATE CRIMES

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation aimed at combating a national problem of disgraceful proportions—namely the proliferation of so-called hate crimes directed against religious property, institutions, and practices. My legislation represents a modified version of a bill I sponsored in the prior Congress.

Specifically my bill provides the following:

It establishes stiff new federal penalties on a graduated basis against individuals who engage in acts of violence or vandalism against religious institutions property or individuals seeking the free exercise of their religion. The minimum penalty would be a fine of $250,000 or imprisonment for not more than five years. The most severe penalty would be imposed in those instances where death results. In that case the individual could receive life imprisonment.

It requires the Attorney General to include in the uniform crime reports information regarding the incidence of offenses involving racial, ethnic or religious prejudice.

My legislation addresses itself to a real and present problem which shows no sign of abating. All one has to do is review the most recent report issued by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith discussing incidents of antisemitism during 1984. The report indicates that the number of incidences of "anti-Semitic vandalism and of other attacks against Jewish institutions, businesses and homes in the United States during 1984 showed a small increase compared to 1983." Specifically the ADL reported a total of 715 of these cases or the equivalent of almost 2 a day for the entire year.

Included in these cases were major increases in such heinous crimes as bombings, arsons, and cemetery desecrations. In 1984, there were three bombings as compared to none in 1983. There were nine arsons in 1984 compared to three in 1983. There were 11 cases of cemetery desecrations in 1984 as compared to 9 in 1983.

In addition, the ADL reported that there was a 5.4-percent increase in the number of assaults against Jewish individuals and threats and harassment in which Jewish individuals or Jewish-owned properties were the victims or targets. All told there were a total of 369 such cases in 1984.

The ADL reports noted that the 715 hate crimes directed against Jewish individuals and property were concentrated in 32 States and the District of Columbia, the same total of States as in 1983. As the report states: "Once again as in recent years New York and California were the States reporting the largest number of anti-Semitic vandalisms—New York with 237 and California with 99."

One of the main reasons for my legislation is the fact that there remains a glaring lack of initiative on the part of State and local governments to fight this problem. The Federal Government must set the example and impose stiff new penalties against those individuals who commit these acts against any religious institution or individual. Certain States and localities have been aggressive in combating this problem but the best proof rests with statistics. Again citing the ADL report, during 1984 police and law enforcement authorities arrested 84 people in connection with 51 of the total number of incidents reported. This represents less than 10 percent of the cases reported. That is an unacceptably low figure.

It is my hope that my combined approach will provide the foundation upon which we can build an effective strategy to combat these hate crimes.

We must provide a deterrent against these crimes by providing penalties which are certain. Further, it is vital that we take a better account of the situation by having the vast resources of the Justice Department keep statistics on the number of these crimes committed against all religions.

Failure to act to combat this problem in many ways is as bad as condoning their existence. Worse it invites their continuation. I urge the Judiciary Committee to schedule early hearings on my proposal as well as others that have been introduced to achieve the same objective.

The text of the bill follows:

A bill to require the Attorney General to include in the uniform crime reports information regarding the incidence of offenses involving racial, ethnic, or religious prejudice and to amend chapter 13 of title 18, United States Code, to prohibit damage to property used for religious purposes, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That under authority of section 534 of title 28, United States Code, the Attorney General shall acquire, and shall include in the uniform crime reports, information regarding the incidence of the following offenses:

(1) Robbery, burglary, theft, arson, vandalism, and trespass involving property which symbolizes, or is customarily used in, the performance of a religious activity or the achievement of a religious purpose.

(2) Homicide, assault, robbery, burglary, theft, arson, vandalism, and trespass committed to manifestly express racial, ethnic, or religious prejudice.

SEC. 2. (a) Chapter 13 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new sections:

"§ 247. Damage to property used for religious purposes

"(a) Whoever willfully damages or destroys or attempts to damage or destroy—

"(1) a cemetery;

"(2) a building or other real property used for religious purposes; or

"(3) a religious article contained in a cemetery or such building or real property; shall be fined not more than $250,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both; if bodily injury results, shall be fined not more than $250,000 or imprisoned not more than fifteen years, or both; and if death results, shall be fined not more than $250,000 or imprisoned for any term of years or for life, or both.

"§ 248. Injury to person exercising religious beliefs

"Whoever injures, intimidates, or interferes with any person in the free exercise of that person's religious beliefs secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States shall be fined not more than $250,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both; if bodily injury results, shall be fined not more than $250,000 or imprisoned not more than fifteen years, or both; and if death results, shall be fined not more than $250,000 or imprisoned for any term of years or for life, or both.".

(b) The table of sections for chapter 13 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new items:

"247. Damage to property used for religious purposes.

"248. Injury to person exercising religious beliefs.".●

THE BASIC SKILLS ACT

HON. PAT WILLIAMS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, last year the President's Commission on Excellence in Education pointed out serious deficiencies in the ability of this Nation's secondary schools to provide students with basic academic skills. And, according to data from the National Assessment of Educational Progress, the achievement of high school age students has fallen steadily in reading, writing, math, and science since the early 1970's. In contrast, in the elementary grades, where chapter I moneys are heavily concentrated, student achievement has been marked by impressive gains.

Today I, along with my colleague, JIM FLORIO, am introducing the Secondary Schools Basic Skills Act, to help schools correct the deficiencies by providing qualifying local secondary schools with grants to develop, implement, and conduct basic skills instructional activities for all low-achieving students attending. My colleague, JIM FLORIO, again joins me in this effort. To be eligible, at least 20 percent of a school's student body must qualify as low-income students on the basis of chapter I criteria or be eligible for a free school lunch.

After the first 2 full years of program operation, continued funding would be contingent upon a school's improvement in the number of students passing a nationally normed test of basic skills, or a decrease in the school's dropout rate. This is an important quality control feature of this legislation.

An educated citizenry is our strength. I hope that all my colleagues will join me in sponsoring this legislation.

The language of the bill follows:

H.R. 901

A bill to provide a program of grants to assist local educational agencies to improve the basic skills of economically disadvantaged secondary school students, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited at the "Secondary School Basic Skills Act".

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this Act to furnish financial assistance to local educational agencies having especially high concentrations of youths from low-income families to enable such agencies to provide more effective instruction in basic skills for economically disadvantaged secondary school students.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. As used in this Act—

(1) the term "basic skills" includes reading, writing, communications, and mathematics proficiency as well as problem-solving, comprehension, and reasoning;

(2) the term "economically disadvantaged secondary school students" means students, aged twelve to seventeen, inclusive, who are counted under section 111(c) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, as modified by chapter 1 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981 or who qualify for a free school lunch under section 9 of the National School Lunch Act of 1946;

(3) the term "institution of higher education" has the same meaning given that term under section 1201(a) of the Higher Education Act of 1965;

(4) the term "local educational agency" has the same meaning given that term under section 198(a)(10) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965;

(5) the term "secondary school" has the same meaning given that term under section 198(a)(7) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965;

(6) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education; and

(7) the term "State" means each of the several States, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and the Northern Mariana Islands.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 4. There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of this Act—

(1) $900,000,000 for the fiscal year 1986 of which—

(A) $3,000,000 shall be available for the technical assistance and national evaluation under section 10(a) and (d); and

(B) the remainder shall be available for grants under section 7;

(2) $900,000,000 for the fiscal year 1987 of which—

(A) $3,000,000 shall be available for the technical assistance and the national evaluation under section 10(a) and (d); and

(B) the remainder shall be available for grants under section 7;

(3) $900,000,000 for the fiscal year 1988 of which—

(A) $4,000,000 shall be available for the provision of technical assistance and national evaluation under section 10(a) and (d);

(B) the remainder shall be available for grants pursuant to section 7; and

(4) $900,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1989, 1990, and 1991 of which—

(A) $4,000,000 shall be available for provision of technical assistance and for the national evaluation to be conducted under section 10(a) and (d); and

(B) the remainder shall be available for program grants under section 7.

ELIGIBILITY

SEC. 5. A secondary school is eligible to receive assistance under this Act for grants only if 20 per centum or more youths aged twelve to seventeen, inclusive, who are enrolled in such school and are counted under section 111(c) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, as modified by chapter 1 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981 or who qualify for a free school lunch under section 9 of the National School Lunch Act of 1946.

USES OF FUNDS

SEC. 6. Funds made available under this Act for grants shall be used for the development of approaches to, and for carrying out educational services and activities designed specifically to raise the basic skills of low-achieving students attending eligible secondary schools.

PROGRAM GRANTS

SEC. 7. (a) From the amounts appropriated for grants pursuant to section 4 for fiscal years 1985 through 1990, the Secretary is authorized, in accordance with the provisions of this section, to make grants to enable eligible secondary schools to develop, implement, and carry out new approaches to achieving improved basic skills instruction of low-achieving students attending eligible secondary schools.

(b) No grant may be made under this section unless—

(1) an application is submitted at such time, in such manner, and containing or accompanied by such information as the Secretary deems necessary;

(2) the application is made—

(A) by the local educational agency on behalf of an eligible secondary school, or

(B) by an institution of higher education acting in concert with the local education agency or, where clearly appropriate, a public agency or private nonprofit organization acting in concert with the local education agency, on behalf of an eligible secondary school if the institution, agency, or organization will provide educational services or will conduct educational activities for students enrolled in eligible secondary schools subject to the proposal for which the assistance is sought;

(3) the application contains assurances that the applicant will participate in the national evaluation required by section 10(a);

(4) the proposal described in the application was prepared with the participation of administrators (including principals), teachers, and parents in the eligible secondary schools, and, where appropriate, individuals representing participating institution of higher education, public agencies, or nonprofit organizations; and

(5) the appropriate State educational agency was provided an opportunity for review and comment prior to submittal to the Secretary under this subsection.

(c) In approving applications under this section the Secretary shall assure that eligible applicants represent various geographic regions of the country, including both rural and urban secondary schools within these various geographic regions.

ASSURANCES

SEC. 8. Each local educational agency which desires to receive a grant under this Act shall file with the Secretary an application containing assurances that—

(1) the local educational agency will be designated as the agency responsible for the administration and supervision of programs assisted under this Act; and

(2) the local educational agency will use grants made under this Act—

(A) so as to supplement the level of funds that would, in the absence of such grants, be made available from non-Federal sources for the purposes of the program for which assistance is sought; and

(B) in no case to supplant such funds from non-Federal sources.

APPLICATIONS

SEC. 9. (a) Any eligible organization may apply for a five-year grant, subject to restrictions in section 11(b)(1), on behalf of an eligible secondary school. Each such application shall—

(1) describe the eligible secondary school and the program to be conducted at the eligible secondary school for carrying out the purposes of section 6;

(2) provide assurances that the program for which assistance is sought is of sufficient size, scope, and quality as to give reasonable promise of substantial progress toward improving the basic skills of low-achieving students in eligible secondary schools and that the proposed program properly utilizes the latest research on effective schools, teaching, student learning, and student retention;

(3) provide assurances that the program for which assistance is sought was designed and will be implemented in consultation with parents, teachers, principals, and administrators of low-achieving students in eligible secondary schools;

(4) describe, in the case of a local educational agency, the procedures which the local educational agency will follow with respect to subcontracting to any private nonprofit organization, any program or activity to be conducted in an eligible secondary school for low-achieving secondary school students if the agency determines that the alternative education program to be offered by such organization will best serve the interests of such students;

(5) provide assurances that the agency will cooperate with Federal efforts to evaluate the effectiveness of the programs assisted under this Act;

(6) provide such assurances as the State educational agency may reasonably require; and

(7) provide assurances that the local education agency will expend no more than 2 per centum of total grant funds to administer this program.

(b) An application filed under subsection (a) of this section may be amended annually as may be necessary to reflect changes without filing a new application.

ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 10. (a) The Secretary shall, through the National Institute of Education, conduct a national evaluation of the effectiveness and the implementation of the grants made under section 7.

(b) The Secretary shall submit to the Congress and disseminate to State and local educational agencies, State legislatures, and Governors the results of the assessment made under subsection (a) of this section.

(c) The Secretary, through the National Institute of Education, shall monitor grants made under this Act and shall carry out procedures for the coordination of activities assisted under this Act with other research activities conducted by the National Institute of Education and through the Office of Educational Research and Improvement in the Department.

(d) The National Institute of Education, once program grants are awarded, shall provide eligible recipients with technical assistance, including assistance designed to facilities program evaluation, to ensure the successful implementation and carrying out of the proposed program of basic skills instruction.

(e) The Secretary shall not disapprove the application filed by the local education agency without affording notice and opportunity for a hearing.

PAYMENTS; RESTRICTIONS

SEC. 11.(a) The Secretary shall make payments as expeditiously as possible after the approval of applications under section 7.

(b)(1) If, after completion of the first two academic years of program operation, there is not meaningful improved performance of the targeted secondary school students at the eligible school on a nationally normed test of basic skills, or there is not a meaningful decrease in the crop-out rate at such school, no further grant may be made with respect to that secondary school to any local education agency or to any institution of higher education, public agency, or private nonprofit organization. The Secretary is authorized to grant a waiver for one additional academic year of programming if external conditions warrant a waiver of this requirement.

(2) The Secretary shall prescribe regulations to carry out the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection.●

HYDROELECTRIC RELICENSING

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, recently, I, and other members of the Florida congressional delegation, signed on again as cosponsors of the Electric Consumers Protection Act, introduced this session as H.R. 44 by RICHARD SHELBY of Alabama. The bill responds to an issue of basic fairness and equity for millions of consumers. At stake are billions of kilowatt-hours of low-cost hydroelectricity. That inexpensive power could be taken away from the vast majority and made available to only a small segment of this country's consumers who by geographic happenstance are served by government-run State or municipal utilities.

Although Florida is not rich in hydroelectric power, this important consumer issue is arising with increasing frequency in the relicensing of existing projects throughout the country. And of course, it is of particular concern to me on behalf of the country's senior citizens, many of whom are living on fixed incomes. Congress must ensure that no Americans, and particularly the elderly, are forced to pay higher electric bills due to a preferential policy that would allow government-run utilities to take away this low-cost energy from millions.

A little background will help to make clear the inequities inherent in such a preferential policy. Hydroelectric projects are licensed by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission for periods of up to 50 years. When the initial license expires, the existing licensee must file an application with FERC for a new license if it wishes to continue to operate these valuable projects. At the time of relicensing, other applicants may file applications for the new license in competition with the existing licensee. If a competing application is judged on the merits by FERC to be best adapted to develop the resource, the competitor should and would receive the new license for the project.

But because of a lack of clarity in the Federal Water Power Act of 1920, now the Federal Power Act, and conflicting interpretations in recent years, the law is now unclear whether competing State and municipal utilities are to be given a preference against existing private licensees at the time of relicensing these projects. If State and municipal licensees have a preference, they will be able to take away hydroelectric projects from existing licensees and their customers simply by filing plans to develop the water resource that are only as good as the existing licensees, not better. Thus, by reason only of the government status of such potential competitors, the low-cost hydroelectric power would be transferred from millions of consumers of existing licensees to the relatively small segment of consumers who happen to live in an area served by a State or municipally operated electric utility. This does not make sense.

If the existing licensee has had a successful 50-year track record of operating these projects in the public interest and FERC determines the licensee would continue to do so in the future, it should receive the new license. Why cause the economic hardship and disruption associated with transferring ownership of these valuable assets, when the public interest in utilizing the resource would not be served any better by the new owner?

The unfairness is readily apparent. Municipal competitors are currently trying to take away 11 hydroelectric projects from private utilities that have developed, operated, and maintained them for the benefit of their customers for 50 years or more. Over 8.5 million customers benefit from the these 11 projects operated by the existing licensees. The competing municipal utilities have only 955,000 electric customers. This is a 9-to-1 ratio. Using 1983 prices and data, those 8.5 million customers realized, in that year alone, fuel-cost savings based on equivalent fossil-fueled generation of approximately $308 million. And such equivalent fuel-cost savings occur year after year. With approximately 177 investor-owned utility hydroprojects coming up for relicensing by December 31, 1993, and more after that, these same comparisons will be arising across the country.

But why should Congress adopt a policy that could have the effect of making nine consumers worse off for the sake of just one who will benefit? Already customers of State and municipal utilities, which represent approximately 13 percent of the electric customers in the country, have preferential access to 68.3 percent of the hydroelectric project capacity in the country. This is because Federal laws already give them: First, a preference to obtain initial licenses to develop new hydroelectric sites, and, second, a preference to purchase low-cost power generated at federally owned and operated hydroelectric projects. Because the customers of private utilities, which represent 76.5 percent of the country's electric consumers, have none of these preferences, they have only 31.6 percent of the country's hydroelectric capacity. Given these facts, I do not believe it is good public policy for the small segment of electric consumers served by municipal utilities to receive through a relicensing preference even more of such inexpensive electricity simply because of the government ownership status of the electric utility which provides them service.

Hydroelectricity is a relatively inexpensive form of power because it has no associated fossil or nuclear fuel costs. Throughout most regions of the country it helps to hold down the cost of electricity for millions of consumers served by investor-owned utilities having a generating mix that includes more expensive fossil or nuclear generation or both. If these utilities lose their hydroelectric projects their cost of electricity will increase. This would not be as troublesome if it resulted from fair competition for and better utilization of the resource. However, consumers, particularly, the elderly, should not be forced to bear the burden of increased electric rates, no matter what the amount, in order to benefit a relatively small segment of preferred consumers whose only claim on the resource is that they happen to be served by State or municipal utilities. Those utilities for the most part already boast of electric rates well below typical rates for customers of neighboring investor-owned utilities. On this score, I direct my colleagues attention to a very constructive article by two MIT economics professors recently published in Public Utilities Fortnightly. The article concludes that a municipal relicensing preference would only promote economic inefficiency in the allocation of our hydroelectric resources. Joskow and Schmalensee, "Adversary Hydro Reli-censing Applications: Using Economic Efficiency Criteria," Public Utilities Fortnightly, December 20, 1984.

I agree with the statement of the executive director of the American Association of Retired Persons in a letter to the president of the Edison Electric Institute endorsing H.R. 4402, Congressman SHELBY's bill in the 98th Congress:

> The country's older Americans, most of whom live on limited incomes, can ill afford increases in electric rates and the cost of goods and services, particularly those resulting from laws and policies that do not reflect equity, fairness and the public interest.

Congress should not enact yet another preference for a small class of consumers. Instead, Congress should promote fair competition for this valuable low-cost form of electricity in order that it be spread equitably among as many consumers throughout the country as possible. H.R. 44, the Electric Consumers Protection Act, would do just that and, therefore, has my full support.●

HOUSE HONORS SEVEN EAGLE SCOUTS FROM SIXTH DISTRICT

HON. BEN ERDREICH

OF ALABAMA

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, the attainment of the highest rank of Scouting, Eagle Scout, is an achievement toward which all Boy Scouts aspire but few achieve. That is why I feel particularly honored to represent Boy Scout Troop No. 86 in Birmingham, AL, which will hold an Eagle Scout award ceremony on Monday, February 4, 1985, to present, not one, but seven Eagle Scout badges to seven outstanding young men.

The seven young men who have attained this highest scouting rank are Charles B. Collat, John O. Greaves, Bryan B. Patton, Lee A. Pilleteri, William E. Smith III, Thomas M. Spencer, and Benjamin S. Will. All possess the strength of character, integrity, physical and leadership abilities that our country needs as we advance into the future.

Only 2 percent of the Scouts across this country achieve the rank of Eagle Scout, and it is quite extraordinary for this number, seven, to become Eagle Scouts in one location. This is a testament not only to these fine young men, but also, the members of Troop No. 86 in Birmingham and Scoutmaster Harry Jeffcoat III, who has done such an outstanding job of providing these youth with the tools they will need to be tomorrow's leaders.

I believe Scoutmaster Jeffcoat, and these young men and their parents, deserve to be recognized by my colleagues in the House of Representatives. They have earned our admiration, praise, and respect.●

YOUTH—AMERICA'S STRENGTH

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, 1985, more than 200 of my constituents came from Pennsylvania to our Nation's Capital to witness the swearing in ceremony for the U.S. House of Representatives. Many of them had visited Washington, DC, before, but for some this was their first glimpse of their Government in action.

One guest in particular, Melissa A. Houghton of Sunbury, PA, was no stranger to Washington. Ms. Houghton came to Washington on March 8, 1983, to be honored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars as their student Voice of Democracy champion. Melissa's winning speech was on the theme of "Youth—America's Strength."

Miss Houghton, now a freshman student attending Dickinson College in Carlisle, PA, was asked by her Congressman to give her impressions of what it was like to visit our Nation's Capital for the very first time. I am very pleased to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the speech Ms. Houghton delivered to the people of the 17th Congressional District during their visit to Washington.

YOUTH—AMERICA'S STRENGTH

(By Melissa Houghton)

Crowds of people hurrying everywhere. Hundreds of cars in different shapes, sizes, and colors. Families walking in the park. Small children playing. Motion. . . . These are sights that can be seen in every major city of the U.S. Business is transacted, children are being educated and life goes on. However, the above description of any city appeals only to the eyes and to the ears. It takes a very special place, specifically our nation's capital, to also appeal to one's heart. I would like to take a few minutes to describe the feelings that an American citizen has in coming to Washington D.C. Perhaps the most prevalent feeling one has upon entering the nation's capital is a tremendous sense of history. At the core of this history is the Smithsonian Institution. This giant testimonial to our nation's past transcends all textbooks. The exhibits can be viewed, the explanations heard, but the true meaning behind this exhibit can only be felt. The monuments also provide this feeling of history. Giant-sized statues to long-gone heroes remind us of all that our country has fought for. From the honesty of Lincoln to the bravery of our men in battle, monuments have been erected to remind us of our heritage. Though these also, can be viewed, the true meaning of the rows of thousands of tombstones in Arlington or the importance of the enormous Lincoln Memorial can only be felt.

However, this is only a very small part of what an American citizen feels upon coming to Washington. It is impossible to be here without realizing the power that is housed in this city. It was once said that the Oval Office is the innermost sanctuary of American power. Within this office and others throughout the city, life changing decisions are constantly being made. These decisions not only affect you and I as American citizens, but also citizens throughout the world. It is impossible for a person to overlook this aspect of the Capital. Just as it is possible to feel this power emanating from all surroundings, it is inevitable that one would feel awed by the men and women that hold this power.

Finally, an American citizen feels a very rare emotion in Washington-security. At a time when there is so much unrest in the nation and the world, one can find solace here. There is the Washington Monument which reaches to the sky proclaiming the greatness and strength of our nation. The Viet Nam Memorial which proudly displays the names of our brave men that gave their lives for our country. Also, the White House, built like an elegant fortress to protect our citizens from harm. All of these elements help contribute to this feeling of security.

There is yet one more aspect that contributes to this feeling. The way the city was set up provides for a sense of continuity and security. Designed in the shape of a wheel, Washington is certainly a place where ideas are set in motion. With the mall as the hub of the wheel, avenues radiate outward toward key sites forming the spokes, when viewed from the Washington Monument at night, the lights help to complete the design.

Automobiles, people rushing, horns blowing. These are sights and sounds that can be observed by any citizen in any city of the world. Historical heritage, power, awe, security. These are emotions that can only be felt by American citizens in Washington, D.C.—a city that appeals to one's heart and mind.●

THE REAGAN INAUGURAL

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, January 30, 1985, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE REAGAN INAUGURAL ADDRESS

President Reagan delivered his second Inaugural Address in the Rotunda of the U.S. Capitol before a restricted group of 1,000 people. Members of Congress, the Diplomatic Corps, the Cabinet, and close friends of the President were in attendance. For the first time in history, outdoor events were cancelled because of record low temperatures and brisk winds. The indoor setting gave the ceremony an unusual air of intimacy.

Mr. Reagan's style was low key and undramatic. Several Members of Congress observed that the President seemed subdued. The speech lacked rhetorical flair, and it was delivered in conversational tones. It was no call to arms. Mr. Reagan, said one observer, did not exactly come "roaring out of the gate."

The President made it clear from the outset of his speech that he did not intend to redirect his energies or revise his programs at the beginning of his second term. "I don't believe you re-elected us in 1984 to reverse course," he said. He was characteristically optimistic, seeing America "poised for greatness," on the verge of "a new emancipation," still "mighty in its youth and powerful in its purpose." The speech was suffused with hope and patriotism; the future that Mr. Reagan described was rich with possibilities. Some of the speech was eloquent, as when the President talked of the American sound, "hopeful, big-hearted, idealistic—daring, decent, fair. That's our heritage, that's our song. We sing it still."

In his address, Mr. Reagan returned to the themes of his political past. Indeed, the largely inspirational speech was vintage Reagan. Part of it was a vindication of his first term, and he spoke with genuine conversative conviction as he sketched the agenda for 1985. For him, progress will come with a smaller role for government and a wider role for free enterprise, an "economy finally freed from government's grip." He placed great faith in a healthy, vigorous, growing economy as the surest cure for inequality in the land. He promised "an opportunity society" that will free the economically disadvantaged from dependency on a bloated bureaucracy. He claimed that "there are no limits to growth and human progress, when men and women are free to follow their dreams." He stressed his favorite issues: limits on domestic spending, continuation of the military buildup, shifting federal programs to the States, radical tax reform, and a constitutional amendment mandating a balanced budget.

The President hit big government hard in his speech, but in his first term he did little to cut it back. Rather, he has switched its direction, spending less on domestic programs and more on defense. Mr. Reagan correctly stated that "we have begun to reduce the increase in the cost and size of government." It is important to note, however, that he is not claiming government has gotten smaller. The federal share of the gross national product claimed from 22.8 percent in 1981 to 23.5 percent in 1984. The real difference between the President and his critics is not that the former resists the exercise of government power while the latter supports it, but rather that each considers the exercise of that power to be appropriate in different circumstances.

Mr. Reagan also attacked the federal budget deficits that rose sharply in his first term. Indeed, the average annual deficit of the Reagan Administration ($134.8 billion) was three times greater than the average annual deficit of the Carter Administration ($45.3 billion). In addition, the national debt doubled, and the government's ability to control the budget weakened dramatically. The President warned that "a time of reckoning" has arrived, but the critics point out that he should be presenting a balanced budget, not a balanced budget amendment which would not take effect for years. He has announced a program "aimed at freezing government program spending for the next year." That carefully phrased statement leaves room, for example, for much higher interest payments on the national debt. We will know more about the program in a few days, but there is nothing to suggest in early reports that it will be significant.

With respect to the Soviet Union, Mr. Reagan was unrelenting, though careful, in his rhetoric. He pointedly said that "one nation, the Soviet Union, has conducted the greatest military buildup in the history of man." Nonetheless, he pledged to press ahead with nuclear arms control. In that vein, he spoke of his desire "to rid the world of the threat of nuclear destruction" and made extravagant claims about his "Star Wars" plan to destroy nuclear missiles before they reached their target: the plan "wouldn't kill people; it would destroy weapons and would render nuclear weapons obsolete." In a strange aside, the President discredited mutual assured destruction as an ineffective and immoral strategic doctrine, even though it is the only deterrent to nuclear war known to be effective.

I did not hear much new in Mr. Reagan's address. Thus, I think that he will pursue the agenda of the past four years, with the possible addition of arms control and tax reform. The doubt in my mind is whether the President will be able to translate his goals into reality. Presidents have not always had an easy time doing that, though Mr. Reagan does have a lot going for him. He enjoys high personal popularity. He appears buoyant and vigorous. He articulates the clear public mood to limit the role of government and strengthen national security. I was not surprised that the tone of the speech was somewhat conciliatory. It is obvious that the President wants to get things done. He made several bipartisan gestures, but there was no suggestion at all that he will moderate his stance on today's most divisive issues.

Mr. Reagan's program, as set forth in his inaugural speech, will be spelled out in more detail in the State of the Union address and the budget message. Then the action will move to Congress.●

THE NATIONAL CHILD PROTECTION ACT

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, along with my colleague from New York, Senator ALFONSE D'AMATO, I introduced, H.R. 276, the National Child Protection Act. This bill is identical to the bill that was introduced during the second session of the 98th Congress.

This bill is designed to provide full-scale protection of children in federally funded day care centers from abuse and addresses a problem which has grown in severity in the past several years. We have seen a tenfold increase in the number of reported cases of sexual abuse of children in day care centers, just since 1976. Major scandals rocked both New York and California last year and began what seemed to be an almost chain reaction in other cities and towns across the country.

In introducing H.R. 276, we are taking the step of conditioning future Federal aid for day care in recognition of the fact that a significant portion of Federal funds support these activities. In New York City, for example, as much as 60 percent of the $165 million spent on day care is Federal money. A majority of these funds come from the social services block grant—formerly title XX, of the Social Security Act. The philosophy behind the block grant was to minimize Federal regulation of activities and to encourage States to conduct initiatives tailored to their own needs.

What the block grant experiment has demonstrated, in this instance, is that the elimination of the Federal presence, has resulted in more than just a lessening of Federal responsibility. In my eyes, it represents a full-scale abdication of these responsibilities which cannot be tolerated if in abdicating, we contribute to something as abhorrent as child abuse.

The National Child Protection Act would promote the safety of children receiving day care services by conditioning future Federal funds for such services by requiring States to establish programs to license child day centers as well as provide for a screening of day care center personnel. The act also establishes a clearinghouse for information with respect to criminal records of employees of day care centers and establishes a toll-free hotline for the reporting of abuse of children receiving day care services.

It is critical to note that in response to national attention focused on this problem last year, Congress approved an increase of $25 million in funding under the social services block grant, specifically aimed at reducing this problem through improved training of day care center personnel and parents. On January 15, of this year, the Department of Health and Human Services published conditions for use of this $25 million by States. I commend the Department for moving in an expeditious fashion to ensure that these training funds are utilized as quickly as possible. However, I also believe that under the block grant scheme, flexibility is still provided to a number of providers that would not necessarily protect all children in all kinds of day care facilities. The approach provided in my bill would impose a greater responsibility upon States to protect services to children in all kinds of facilities.

In addition to the training guidelines, on January 28, HHS also released a Model Child Care Standards Act which will provide guidance to State day care licensing authorities in establishing protection programs within facilities and for parents. This act is most worthy of our close attention and in my eyes, should be the adopted national standard—not an option for States to adopt at their discretion. This act is consistent with one of the recommendations of the Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families in its report released at the end of last year on "Families and Child Care: Improving the Options."

Last year on September 17, the select committee, chaired by my distinguished colleague GEORGE MILLER, in conjunction with the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Oversight, chaired by my good friend CHARLIE RANGEL, conducted a hearing on child abuse in day care facilities. In my testimony before that hearing I joined with a number of witnesses in urging quick action to address this problem. I am pleased that our initial efforts in Congress produced the much-needed $25 million in new block grant funds for training and expect that this will be the start of a national crusade to attack and eliminate this problem.

Passage of H.R. 276 would enhance this effort and I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this initiative.

H.R. 276

A bill to promote the safety of children receiving day care services by establishing a national program for the licensing of child day care providers, establishing a clearinghouse for information with respect to criminal records of employees of day care centers, and establishing a hotline for reporting of abuse of children receiving day care services, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "National Child Protection Act".

AMENDMENT TO TITLE XX

SEC. 2. Title XX of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"LICENSING AND INFORMATION WITH RESPECT TO PROVIDER OF CHILD BY CARE SERVICES

"SEC. 2008. (a) As a condition for receiving any funds under this title, a State must have in effect a program under which—

"(1) the State will require the licensing and monitoring of all providers of child day care services in accordance with the standards established by the Secretary pursuant to subsection (b);

"(2) the State will provide information to the Secretary with respect to all individuals providing child day care services or employed by providers of child day care services, and with respect to all individuals convicted of child abuse, child molesting, or similar crimes, in accordance with subsection (c); and

"(3) the State will have in effect a toll-free telephone hotline for the reporting of any allegations of child abuse, child molestation, or simliar acts committed by any individual providing child day care services or by any employee of a provider of child day care services, in accordance with subsection (d).

"(b)(1) The Secretary shall by regulation establish standards and guidelines for State licensing and monitoring of providers of child day care services. Such standards and guidelines shall assure the safety, health, and developmental potential of children while receiving child day care services, and shall promote the social, emotional, physical, and cognitive growth of such children while receiving such services. The standards and guidelines shall include provisions for assuring that only adequately trained individuals provide such services.

"(2) The Secretary shall determine a uniform definition of 'child day care services', and of a 'provider of child day care services', which shall apply for purposes of this section, and which will assure that the maximum feasible number of children shall be protected under the provisions of this section.

"(c)(1) The Secretary shall establish a national file of the names, addresses, and social security numbers of all individuals convicted of crimes involving child abuse, child molestation, or such similar acts which the Secretary determines ought to be included in such file for the purpose of protecting children receiving child day care services.

"(2) Each State shall report to the Secretary the name, address, and social security number of any individual convicted in such State of child abuse, child molestation, or a similar act which the Secretary has determined under paragraph (1) ought to be included in the national file. For purposes of this paragraph the Secretary shall establish a uniform reporting system which shall apply to all the States.

"(3) Each State shall require that no individual or provider may be licensed to provide child day care services in such State if such individual, or any employee of such provider, has been convicted of a crime which has been reported (by any State) to the Secretary and is contained in the national file. Each State must, for purposes of ensuring compliance with this subsection, request the Secretary to check the names of each individual seeking a license to provide child day care services, and each employee of a provider seeking such a license, against the list of names contained in the national file, prior to granting such license.

"(d) Each state shall establish a toll-free telephone hotline for the reporting of any allegations of child abuse, child molestation, or any similar act designated by the Secretary for inclusion in the national file, committed by an individual providing child day care services, or by an employee of a provider of such services. The State must provide followup investigation of each such allegation in accordance with standards established by the Secretary under regulations.

"(e)(1) There is established an 'Advisory Panel on Child Protection', hereafter in this section referred to as the 'Panel'. The Panel shall consist of 13 members as follows:

"(A) four members appointed by the President, one of whom shall be designated as the chairman;

"(B) four members appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives;

"(C) four members appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate (upon recommendation of the majority leader and the minority leader); and

"(D) the Secretary of Health and Human Services, ex officio.

"(2) It shall be the duty of the Panel to advise the Secretary with respect to the standards and guidelines issued under this section, and to propose any recommendations for changes in such standards and guidelines which may be appropriate.

"(3) Members of the Panel who are not employees of the United States shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and shall be compensated at a per diem rate established by the Secretary for each day (including traveltime) during which they are engaged in the actual business of the Panel. Any member of the Panel engaging in the actual business of the Panel away from his home or place of business may be allowed travel expenses (including per diem in lieu of subsistence) as authorized by section 5703 of title 5, United States Code, for persons in the Government service employed intermittently.

"(4) The Secretary shall make available to the Panel such clerical and other assistance, and any pertinent data prepared by the Secretary, as the Panel may require to carry out its functions.".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall promulgate all regulations required under section 2008 of the Social Security Act within ninety days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) The requirements of section 2008 of the Social Security Act shall apply to States beginning one hundred and eighty days after the date of enactment of this Act.●

THE SCIENCE TALENT SEARCH

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, recently, Science Service announced the names of 300 outstanding high school seniors across the Nation who have won honors in the 44th Annual Westinghouse Science Talent Search.

Science Search, engaged in the interpretation and public understanding of science on a broad front, administers the annual talent search. The science talent search was the pioneering endeavor to discover at the high school year level those who have the potential to become the research scientists and engineers of the future.

I am proud to note in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD today that a young man from my congressional district, Jonathan Emmanuel Dwarkin, a student attending Hershey High School, was selected into the 1985 honors group. Mr. Dwarkin's winning research project is titled "Neural Mechanisms of Vision and the Evolution of the Alphabet."

The achieving of honors in the science talent search is an evidence of ability and interest in science and engineering. I want the record to reflect my own personal pride in the accomplishment of Mr. Dwarkin, our constituent from Hershey, PA.●

CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, with each passing congressional election, the need for effective, total campaign reform becomes more crucial.

The 1984 congressional elections are no exception to that rule. In fact, these elections strongly reaffirm a growing problem with ever-increasing campaign spending. In effect, our electoral process is flowing from the hands of the people to the pocketbooks of a few and to a megabuck campaign fund.

Once again, campaign spending for congressional elections has set new records. For the 1984 election, over $210 million was spent for House races, an increase of nearly $75 million over the 1982 expenditures. Similarly, expenditures by political action committees have increased during this election cycle. Based on an analysis by Congress Watch, PAC's gave $104 million to congressional races, an increase of 25 percent.

Obviously, Congress must act to end the uncontrolled growth in campaign spending and the increasing role of PAC's. Several positive proposals were introduced last Congress to limit congressional campaign spending and PAC contributions. Hopefully, the 99th Congress will act on this type of legislation.

Mr. Speaker, current campaign finance reforms, no matter how extensive, are undermined by the Supreme Court decision in Buckley versus Valeo. In that decision, the Court ruled that certain campaign expenditures are the equivalent of free speech and thus are protected by the first amendment. In effect, this ruling has handcuffed Federal and State efforts to control independent campaign expenditures.

The amount of independent expenditures in our political process is on the increase. These expenditures are largely negative in content—for the 1981–82 election cycle, 80 percent of independent expenditures were for negative campaigns—and do have a dramatic impact on campaigns. The October 30, 1984, Washington Post reported on the rise in independent expenditures. In that article, the Post noted that a real estate developer spent more than $419,000 of his own money against Senator Charles Percy. Similarly, other races were targeted by independent campaign committees or were funded primarily through personal funds.

A growing tendency is the increased use of independent expenditures by organizational PAC's. Through independent expenditures, these PAC's are able to circumvent existing spending limits and drastically increase their financial support for the candidates of their choice.

Mr. Speaker, until the Buckley versus Valeo decision is modified, meaningful campaign reform will not be effective. Congress can and should limit campaign spending and PAC contributions. However, we must realize that such actions will, in many instances, only give added impetus to uncontrolled independent expenditures. For this reason, I have reintroduced a constitutional amendment to address the problems created by the Supreme Court decision.

The joint resolution would allow Congress and the States to regulate political contributions and expenditures. Under this amendment, the entire issue of campaign spending, from PAC's to independent expenditures, could be addressed rather than the current piecemeal approach to which we are now limited.

Congress and the States have a responsibility to control campaign spending and the joint resolution provides the needed flexibility to Congress and the States to act. I hope that my colleagues will support my resolution so that we may act on needed campaign reforms.●

ESSAY WINNERS FROM THE SOUTH CAROLINA LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR'S ESSAY CONTEST

HON. BUTLER DERRICK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to present to you the essays that were chosen as winners in the South Carolina Lieutenant Governor's Essay Contest for Excellence in Composition for the fifth and eighth grades. This year the winners are brothers—Bill and James Long. Both were school winners for W.E. Parker School and went on to be the district winners for the Edgefield School District. This is the first time that family members have won in the same year.

Their parents, Jim and Cheryl Long of Edgefield, SC, are constituents of mine and I know their family personally. I request that Bill's and James' essays be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that my colleagues may enjoy them. Their essays follows:

IF THE WORLD WERE MINE . . .

(By Bill Long)

If the world were mine, I would try my best to make it a better place for everyone; not just myself or my family friends.

I would first build more and better homes for the elderly and disabled. They have given us the best years of their lives, so now they need special love and care.

Next, I would find more ways and more people to work to find a cure for diseases; such as cerebral palsy, muscular dystrophy, and cancer. The victims of these diseases and their families have suffered enough.

Housing is a problem all over the world. I would like to build more homes and apartments at affordable prices, so everyone would have a nice place to stay.

I would like to have all the governments of the world working together for world peace. If this could happen, maybe everyone would know the freedom we have now in the United States.

There are too many people going to bed hungry at night. I would make sure there was enough food for everyone in all parts of the world. We would no longer see children and adults starving to death.

Maybe it sounds like I would try to play God, but after all, we are all His children. I would just like for everyone in this great, big beautiful world to enjoy their lives as much as I enjoy mine.

SOUTH CAROLINA—NONE FINER

(By James Long)

There are fifty states in this great country of ours, but one state stands out as the greatest. This state is South Carolina. Why, you ask. Let me explain.

South Carolina may not be the largest state in the country in size, but in beauty, opportunity, and love for man and country, it tops the list.

Let's talk about the beauty of our grand state. There are some of the most beautiful gardens here in South Carolina—Magnolia, Edisto, Brookgreen—just to name a few. Beautiful, historic and modern homes line our roadways. How many other states can enjoy the beauty of majestic mountains reaching for the sky and at the same time have the tide of the ocean gently roll over shores? Our state song could well be "South Carolina, The Beautiful."

Opportunities are unlimited in South Carolina. We have some of the greatest colleges—Clemson, University of South Carolina, Citadel, Medical College of Charleston—and many, many more. Land in our great states is great for a variety of crops. We can grow soybeans, corn, cotton, tobacco, apples, peaches, and just about anything else you can name.

There is a wide variety of industries in South Carolina. These are the bread and butter for a lot of people as are our many hydroelectric plants.

South Carolinians love their state. Why else would she be so rich in history?

Many battles of the Civil War were fought on her grounds. Some of our finest leaders have come from South Carolina—Francis Marion, Andrew Jackson, Strom Thurmond and many others.

South Carolina may be small in size, but her people have hearts as big as all outdoors. We are loving, caring people, not just for our neighbors or family, but for everyone regardless of their color or background.

We have traveled to several other states and every time we cross the state line back into South Carolina, Mom always says, "we're back in God's country." I used to not understand what she meant, but as I got older and understood things a little better, I know what she meant. God has truly blessed this great state in more ways than we could ever name. I'm proud to say I'm an American, but it's a special feeling to say I'm a South Carolinian. Our state motto could well be "South Carolina—None Finer".●

THE USE OF MILITARY FORCE

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting my Foreign Affairs Newsletter for January 1985 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE USE OF MILITARY FORCE

When and how military force properly may be applied in the conduct of U.S. foreign policy is the most agonizing issue that government faces. When I am confronted with the decision to send U.S. troops abroad, I remember Walter Lippmann's comment: "I don't think old men ought to promote wars for young men to fight." Looking at the past four years and the places where military force could play a role today, I see little consensus on the conditions under which the United States should bring military force to bear.

Most of us would agree that the use of military force to accomplish our foreign policy objectives should never be ruled out. We should not tie the hands of the President as commander-in-chief or lessen our effectiveness in international relations by letting it be known we will not take up arms. Americans support a posture of military strength and favor the use of military force when the circumstances demand it.

Disagreement arises over what circumstances are appropriate and what limits there should be on the use of military force. Of course, we will respond immediately with devastating effect in the event of an attack on U.S. territory. A forceful response is also likely in the event of an attack on our treaty allies. In other cases, it is usually unclear whether vital U.S. interests are involved and whether military force is the answer.

Limited amounts of economic and military assistance to friendly governments, economic sanctions and other non-military pressure against hostile governments, and the time-honored option of proceeding diplomatically are our preferred instruments in the conduct of U.S. foreign policy. The art of diplomacy especially is underrated. It neither excites nor stirs us. Its successes often are the quiet ones: an unpublicized problem is solved without fanfare or a potential crisis is averted before the threat is widely known. It got the hostages out of Iran, restored the Sinai to Egypt, and turned China from militant adversary to trading partner. The cost of diplomacy is low when compared to the cost of armed intervention, both in taxpayers' dollars and American lives. Diplomacy should be the initial remedy of choice.

Assistance, non-military pressure, and deliberate diplomatic efforts sometimes are not enough to resolve conflicts. When they are not, the use of military force often appeals to us because we believe that it might resolve conflicts advantageously and quickly. It is clear that military force may be used successfully against terrorism, the Israeli attack on Entebbe Airport in Uganda being the best example. Military force also may be used to restore order in a governmental crisis, as President Reagan intended with the U.S. intervention in Grenada.

In assessing whether the use of military force is desirable, we should remember that the results of even the most carefully guided military action may not match our expectations. By its very nature, military action is unpredictable and dangerous. It can produce a strong reaction and further inflame almost any situation. The failed U.S. mission to rescue hostages in Iran and the disastrous commitment of U.S. Marines to Lebanon are cases in point. Military force alone will not help us solve complex political problems in most of the world's trouble spots. It may be harmful if it solidifies anti-U.S. sentiment in the local population, as it often does. When we are presented with local turmoil and the possibility of military action, staying out is the first option that we should consider.

Use of military force that risks the lives of U.S. servicemen is not justified for symbolic reasons. It should be considered only when we have clearly defined objectives and the ability to achieve them in a limited period of time. The cost and size of a military operation must be justified by the immediacy of a threat that military force can quell effectively. Vietnam was the product of an open-ended commitment of U.S. armed forces with dimly perceived objectives and too little attention paid to cost.

There are several other prerequisites for the effective use of military force. We need good intelligence for adequate foreknowledge of the strengths and weaknesses of allies and enemies alike. We need consensus on the particular action in question among key officials. We must have properly trained and equipped troops, ready for combat not only in Europe but also in jungles and deserts in the Third World. We need to understand the local political context into which our armed forces will be introduced. Any use of military force must be integrated with diplomacy.

Possibilities of military success must be weighed against the broader considerations of U.S. foreign policy, including the views of allied governments and the publics that they represent. Generally speaking, we should respect human rights, international law, and the sovereignty of even the smallest nation. It is hard for us to criticize the actions of repressive or aggressive governments if we ourselves do not respect such things. We should not quit the moral "high ground" unless we have a compelling reason closely related to vital U.S. interests.

Most important, no military operation should be contemplated unless there is, as Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger has said, "a reasonable assurance that we will have the support of the American people and their elected representatives in Congress." The Constitution vests in Congress the power to declare war. Federal law demands that Congress review the deployment of U.S. armed forces in hostile conditions overseas. Such requirements are intended to help, not hinder, the President in his role as commander-in-chief.

A final point about the use of military force needs emphasis. If circumstances change after we commence a military operation and our objectives became impossible to achieve, we should cut our losses and withdraw from the field. Such an act shows strength, not impotence. It preserves our military resources for another day and commands more respect at home and abroad than the decision to maintain armed forces in an untenable position.●

POPE HONORS MAINE COUPLE

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, a couple residing in my congressional district has received a special decree from Pope John Paul II, in honor of their extraordinary accomplishment.

John and Anna Ivanisin, of Lisbon Falls, have been married now for 74 years, and for that the Pope presented them with a decree recognizing them as the longest married Roman Catholic couple in Maine. I believe that their marriage is a testament to the endurance and vitality of human compassion, and a symbol of the steadfastness of spirit and stability that characterizes the people of the State of Maine.

I want to add my congratulations and express my respect to the Ivanisins, and include a Lewiston Daily Sun article describing their recognition after my remarks:

LONGEST-MARRIED CATHOLIC COUPLE HONORED—IVANISINS CELEBRATE 74 YEARS TOGETHER

(By Connie Footman)

LISBON FALLS.—A Lisbon Falls couple, John and Anna Ivanisin, were presented a decree from Pope John Paul II Thursday afternoon, in recognition of their distinction as the longest married Roman Catholic couple in Maine.

The Ivanisins have been married 74 years.

Making a special visit to the couple's Lisbon Falls home, Bishop Edward C. O'Leary, bishop of the Diocese of Portland, celebrated Mass and presented the couple with the decree.

The decree featured a picture of the pope and a special message to the couple, which read in part, "The Holy Father commends John and Anna Ivanisin for their love of God and their Fidelity." The presentation was made in conjunction with World Marriage Day to be observed on Feb. 10.

John Ivanisin, a native of what was then Austria-Hungary, and Anna Karkos of New Jersey were married on April 19, 1910 in Lisbon Falls. Shortly thereafter, they moved into the large two story home that John built on 29 Free St., where the couple still live today.

Both worked in the textile mill in Lisbon Falls, then known as Worumbo Manufacturing Co., until their retirement.

An avid baseball player in his youth, Ivanisin still enjoys watching baseball on television.

The couple has five children, Ann Ivanisin, Margaret Ivanisin, Mrs. Catherine Anicetti, Mrs. Marion Kazimer and John Ivanisin, seven grandchildren and 10 great-grandchildren.●

PULLIAM VERSUS ALLEN

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to alleviate a problem raised by the Supreme Court's decision in Pulliam v. Allen (No. 82-1432). In that case, the Court by a 5-4 majority held that judicial immunity is not a bar to the award of attorney's fees under the Civil Rights Attorney's Fees Awards Act even when damages themselves would be barred or limited by immunity doctrines.

In Pulliam, a justice of the peace imposed bail on defendants charged with a nonjailable offense and incarcerated those who did not post sufficient bond, in accordance with State law. The named defendants sought and received injunctive relief against this practice and were awarded $7,691.09 in attorney's fees under 42 U.S.C. 1988. The propriety of this relief was upheld by the Supreme Court.

The threat that this decision poses to the independence of our judiciary was stated in the dissent of Justice Powell, in which the Chief Justice as well as Justices O'Connor and Rehnquist joined. Even though the majority opinion of Justice Blackman recognized and upheld judicial immunity from suits for damages, the dissent warned that the decision opens the door for those who would harass judges with vexatious actions for injunctive relief and make such actions particularly attractive with the litigatory siren song of attorney's fees.

My proposed legislation is not intended to address the broad range of abuse to which 18 U.S.C. 1988 has been subjected and which Justice Powell scored (slip opinion, p. 1213). The legislation attempts only to isolate the major problem and to alleviate it. It does not prohibit the seeking of injunctive relief under 42 U.S.C. 1983 against judges, even though Justice Powell argued that the doctrine of judicial immunity should extend to such actions. Nor on the other hand does it codify that portion of the majority opinion, preferring rather to permit subsequent Court construction on the extent of judicial immunity.

My bill simply prohibits the award of attorney's fees against judges growing out of actions for injunctive relief. As Justice Powell noted in Pulliam, there is no difference between monetary damages against a judge and making him personally liable for a plaintiff's attorney's fees. The latter is the same as the former in its effect and would make even the most conscientious judge reticent about making the difficult decisions necessary to discharge his responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, an independent judiciary is the essence of workable Democracy and must be protected not only from the encroachments of other branches of government, but also from other forms of intimidation.●

COMMEMORATIVE COINS FOR THE SCOUTS

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, this year, and again in 1987, this Nation celebrates two important anniversaries. The first is the 75th anniversary of the Boy Scouts of America and it is followed, just 2 years later, by the diamond jubilee of the Girl Scouts, U.S.A. If ever there were two organizations deserving of recognition for what they have contributed to this country over the years, it is these two. Since their inception in 1910 and 1912 respectively, the Boy Scouts and the Girl Scouts have provided over 133 million youngsters with an opportunity to develop, in a properly supervised setting, new skills, and added confidence. Today, over 6 million boys and girls are members of Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts and their enthusiasm speaks volumes as to the continuing relevancy of scouting.

In view of this record of accomplishment, I feel it is only appropriate that we honor these two fine organizations as they get ready to celebrate their diamond jubilees. Therefore, in association with 16 original cosponsors (Mr. ROE, Mr. HORTON, Mr. RAHALL, Mr. DWYER, Mr. LAGOMARSINO, Mr. FROST, Mr. FRENZEL, Mr. MOORHEAD, Mr. BEVILL, Mr. BRYANT, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. DUNCAN, Mr. SKELTON, Mr. QUILLEN, Mr. EVANS of Iowa, and Mr. REGULA), I am today reintroducing legislation, first introduced in the 98th Congress, calling for the issuance of two commemorative coins, one to mark the 75th anniversay of the Boy Scouts and the other to remember the 75th anniversary of the Girl Scouts. Both coins would be 50 cent pieces, both would be legal tender, both would be coated instead of precious metal, and up to 10 million of each could be produced and made available for purchase. The cost of the coins, to the public, would be 50 cents or the cost of production whichever was higher, a figure low enough to enable scouts themselves to purchase the coins but sufficiently high to make it unlikely there would be any long-term cost to the taxpayer.

Although there haven't been many commemorative coins in recent years—the Olympic coins and the George Washington coin are the only ones that have been produced in the last 30 years—precedents certainly exist for the coins I am recommending. In fact, commemorative coins date all the way back to 1892 and, from that date until their temporary discontinuance in the early 1950's, 68 of them were issued. Moreover, three of those coins—all 50 cent pieces—were diamond jubilee coins, the first honoring the 75th anniversary of California statehood, the second commemorating the 75th anniversary of the Battle of Antietam and the third marking the 75th anniversary of the Battle of Gettysburg. Precedent even exists for issuing commemorative coins either before or after the actual anniversary year; the aforementioned Battle of Gettysburg commemorative half dollar came out 2 years early and a similar coin honoring the 100th anniversary of Alabama statehood came out 2 years late.

Mr. Speaker, my reason for mentioning this last set of precedents is that the measure I am reintroducing calls for both scout coins to be issued in 1986. The reason for that timing is to avoid any possible conflict with the windup of the eminently successful Olympic coin program or the possible startup of a coin program commemorating the bicentennial of the Constitution. Also, a 1986 date for the minting of the two coins should give sufficient time for design consultation with the Boy Scouts and the Girl Scouts (provided for in the bill) as well as the minting and distribution of the coins for sale.

Lest anyone have any doubts as to how deserving these two organizations are of the recognition these coins would confer, let me point out that the Boy Scouts and the Girl Scouts have built a reputation for both individualized instruction and community service. For instance, in my home State of California, just over 2 years ago, more than 15,000 scouts worked for 6 or more hours apiece on public trails and campsites in the Angeles National Forest. And 2 years before that the Boy Scouts volunteered to distribute informational material for the 1980 Census thereby saving American taxpayers some $5 million that year. Indeed, the Boy Scouts even have an award—the Tom C. Clark Award—for scout units that volunteer to do needed work on Government property.

Of course, community work is only one aspect of Scouting; there are many other aspects and advantages. In fact, one of the major benefits that should result from the issuance of Boy and Girl Scout commemorative coins is that they would advertise the virtues of Scouting to millions of children and parents that might not consider it otherwise. The coins would give the two Scout groups more than just a pat on the back for what they have done in the past; they would also speak to the potential of Scouting for the future.

Mr. Speaker, as a former Scout, I could go on at great length about the virtues of Scouting, the adventures it brings, and the sense of responsibility it teaches. But, rather than do that, let me close by simply urging my colleagues to support this commemorative coin legislation and work for its adoption. The monetary value of the coins may not be all that large, but the contributions of the Boy Scouts and the Girl Scouts over the years certainly are. The least we can do is give them the recognition they so richly deserve.

Mr. Speaker, I insert the text of the aforementioned commemorative coin bill in the RECORD at this time:

H.R. 870

A bill to provide for the minting of half dollar coins to commemorate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Boy Scouts of America and the Girl Scouts of the United States of America

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Scout Commemorative Coins Act".

SEC. 2. Section 5112 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary shall mint and issue Boy Scouts of America half dollar coins and Girl Scouts of the United States of America half dollar coins, in such quantities as the Secretary determines are necesessary to meet public demand. Not more than ten million of such Boy Scout coins may be minted under this subsection, and not more than ten million of such Girl Scout coins may be minted under this subsection.

"(2) Each half dollar coin minted under this subsection shall—

"(A) have the size and weight of the half dollar coin described in subsection (a)(2);

"(B) have the composition described in the first four sentences of subsection (b);

"(C) have a design on each side of the coin, determined by the Secretary after consultation with the Boy Scouts of America in the case of the Boy Scout coins and the Girl Scouts of the United States of America in the case of the Girl Scout coins, symbolizing the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Boy Scouts of America or the Girl Scouts of the United States of America, as the case may be; and

"(D) have a designation of the value of the coin, an inscription of the year '1986', and inscriptions of the words 'Liberty', 'In God We Trust', 'United States of America', and 'E Pluribus Unum'.

"(3) All half dollar coins minted under this subsection shall be legal tender as provided in section 5103 of this title.

"(4) The Secretary shall sell the coins minted under this subsection to the public for 50 cents each or, if greater, for a price equal to the average cost of minting and distributing such coins (including expenses for labor, materials, dies, use of machinery, promotion, and overhead).

"(5) Coins may be minted under this subsection only during calendar year 1986.

"(6) There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this subsection.".

SEC. 3. The amendment made by section 2 of this Act shall be effective on October 1, 1985.●

SCOUTS TOP VALOR MEDAL TO GO TO RANDY REED, OF VIENNA, VA

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, a young constituent of mine will be honored by the Boy Scouts of America for extraordinary heroism and I wanted to bring his outstanding efforts to the attention of my colleagues. I ask that the Boy Scouts of America press release be printed at this point in the RECORD:

SCOUTS TOP VALOR MEDAL TO GO TO VIRGINIA YOUTH

IRVING, TX.—Boy Scouting's highest award for valor will go to a Vienna, VA teenager credited with saving the life of a church youth group leader in a swimming accident last June 11.

Randy Reed, 17, of 10400 Hunt Country Lane, Vienna, will be recognized with the Honor Medal for Lifesaving with Crossed Palms in ceremonies slated for Wednesday, February 6, 8 p.m. at Vienna Presbyterian Church, 124 Park St., Vienna, according to National Capital Area Council Scout executive Rudolph Flythe.

It was only the 4th such award approved in the country last year and is the first to go to a Virginian since at least 1968, the earliest year for which records are currently available. It is considered the rarest award offered by the Boy Scouts of America.

Reed, a junior at Oakton High School, is a member of Scout Troop 152, Vienna, chartered to the Vienna Presbyterian Church. He was with a group of young people and adults from that church on a mission project near Robbins, TN, when the incident occurred.

According to Scout officials, Reed was with five others from the Vienna Presbyterian Church who had decided to go swimming in a river near Robbins during a break from mission work in which they were participating. Several of the youths had swung into the river from a steel cable attached to a tree.

Ken Newsome, 24, a leader with the group, slipped from the cable as he swung out over the river, falling and striking his head and hands on a rocky ledge before landing in the water unconscious.

Reed immediately dove into the murky stream and found Newsome on the bottom in about 14 feet of water.

The youth covered Newsome's mouth and nose to prevent further intake of water and, despite more than 50 pounds difference in weight, was able to free him from a rocky crevice and bring him to the surface. He then applied pressure to Newsome's abdomen to expel water from his lungs. Once on shore, he adminstered first aid to a severe cut on the victim's head, and supported an apparently broken wrist and thumb.

With two young women sent to search for aid on one side of the river, Reed then left two Boy Scouts in the group with Newsome, swam across the river, and ran to seek aid on the other side.

"Reed saved Newsome from drowning and demonstrated the value of his Boy Scout training," asserted the National Court of Honor here in approving the recognition.

The youth group leader was treated at Scott County Hospital, Oneida, TN, where 15 stitches were taken to close head wounds and a cast put on the broken wrist. He was subsequently admitted to the University of Virginia Hospital, Charlottesville, for additional hand surgery.

The Honor Medal for Lifesaving is presented by the Boy Scouts of America through action of a national review board to those registered members of the 4.7 million member organization, both youth and adult, "who demonstrate unusual heroism in saving or attempting to save life at the risk of their own."

It is awarded with Crossed Palms in "exceptional cases" to those members, both youth and adult, who demonstrate both unusual heroism and extraordinary skill or resourcefulness in saving or attempting to save life at the extreme risk to their own."

I wish to note that this is only the fourth Honor Medal for Lifesaving with Crossed Palms approved by the Boy Scouts of America last year. It is recognized as the rarest award given by this 4.7 million member organization and is the first to go to a Virginian since 1968.

I join my colleagues in congratulating Randy Reed on this distinctive honor in recognition of his selfless heroism. We are all as citizens enriched and inspired by Randy Reed's example.●

KIM DAE JUNG'S RETURN

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am inserting into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post of January 28 that addresses the circumstances surrounding the return of Kim Dae Jung to his native country, the Republic of Korea. Kim, an outspoken opponent of the Seoul government, was accused of sedition, a charge that was politically motivated. However, after serving 2½ years of a 20 year sentence, and after much pressure from our Government, he was finally allowed to seek medical care in the United States. During his exile here, he has gained the respect of many Members of Congress and the American people as he has pursued his quest to restore civil and human rights in South Korea.

Kim Dae Jung must not meet the same fate upon his return to the Republic of Korea as did Benigno Aquino, the Philippine opposition leader, who sought to return to his land under similar circumstances. Further, the United States should forcefully express our distress with the Seoul government's claims that Kim will be returned to jail upon his return. Further imprisonment is absolutely unacceptable. The Korean Government must be put on notice that the American people will not tolerate the supression of political opinion.

I call on my colleagues in the Congress to direct their attention to this matter, and to join in expressing support for Kim Dae Jung's peaceful return to his native land. In this light, I would commend to my colleagues the following editorial, which cogently expresses this sentiment.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 18, 1985]

KIM DAE JUNG'S RETURN

The shoving between opposition leader Kim Dae Jung and President Chun Doo Hwan of South Korea illustrates nothing so much as the central role the United States plays in the affairs of its longtime ally. It isn't that the Reagan administration is deliberately butting in. But Washington's natural weight is so great that it becomes all but impossible for Korean parties not to try to swing it to their advantage. That puts a burden on Washington in turn to use its weight for American ends.

In 1981 Seoul released Kim Dae Jung early from a 20-year "sedition" sentence—plainly, he was a political prisoner—in order to earn President Chun's passage to Washington to visit President Reagan. In the current cycle, Mr. Kim is preparing what he hopes will be a safe return from Washington exile to Korean public life. He has reaped dramatic publicity by suggestively evoking the assassination of the returning Filipino opposition leader, Benigno Aquino. Around him he has fashioned a living shield comprised of prominent Americans interested in Korean democratization. For his return he deftly chose the moment when President Chun was again planning a visit to Washington—and would again likely be on his best behavior.

It's working well for Mr. Kim so far. Last Tuesday the Chun regime said that if Mr. Kim returned he would be clapped back in jail. On Wednesday the State Department reacted to this publicly, and privately informed Korea that it was deferring announcement of the return visit to Washington that Mr. Chun has avidly sought. On Thursday the Koreans started backtracking on the threat to imprison Mr. Kim. D-Day is Feb. 8.

It infuriates the Korean government to see the gadfly Mr. Kim making this use of the open American political system. But the government has a good alternative: open up the Korean system to make room for legitimate opposition figures such as Mr. Kim. Over the past 30 years, Korea has become, in educational and economic terms, one of the most successful developing countries; it is beginning to challenge Japan. Yet it retains a narrow and obsolete political system dominated by the military.

Both government and opposition are in the habit of turning to the United States for approval and internal leverage. It is one of the clearest signs of Korea's political weakness. Korean politicians should be turning to their own citizens instead. And Washington should always be trying to push them in this direction.●

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION MAINTAINING THE GOVERNMENT'S REGIONAL OFFICE STRUCTURE

HON. NORMAN D. DICKS

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. DICKS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation, on behalf of Congresswoman SCHROEDER and myself which would seek to preserve the existing system of standard Federal regions in the United States. These regions were created by Presidential directive in 1969 as a means of instituting a rational order to the structure of field offices in major Federal agencies. Since that time, the 10 so-called little Washingtons around the Nation have provided access to Federal agencies for millions of people around the Nation. These regional offices of the Department of Labor, the Transportation Department, HHS, and other key Federal agencies have also had the authority to solve regional problems, to commit funds and to represent regional concerns to the headquarters in Washington, DC. This decentralization of the Federal Government made sense in 1969 when it was implemented, and it makes just as much sense today—both economically and in terms of efficiency.

Two years ago, the Reagan administration began a process designed to recentralize authority and staff of Federal agencies by bringing them back to Washington, DC, and eliminating some of the 10 existing standard Federal regions. These regional centers currently exist in Boston, New York, Chicago, Atlanta, Dallas, Kansas City, Seattle, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and Philadelphia. In proposals which were being considered by the Cabinet Council on Management and Administration last year, plans were being made for the total elimination of Federal regions in two to three of these regions, with authority shifted to neighboring regions. Those plans would have produced a regional structure which would have required a person with a Department of Labor Problem in Kansas City, for example, to take that problem to a regional office in Dallas-Fort Worth. Obviously, the opposition which developed on Capitol Hill was enormous, and the Cabinet Council shelved the ill-fated reorganization plan, at least until after the November elections.

But under the guise of slashing the budget and reducing the Federal deficit, the proposal has surfaced again, and this time in an even more devastating form.

I have heard from regional agency personnel from around the Nation who have revealed the plans for dismantling their agencies—this time occurring from the bottom up rather than from the top down. By that I mean that the directive from the Office of Management and Budget has not come on a governmentwide basis—agencies are being asked to develop their own plans for shrinking their field structures, so that the 10-standard Federal regions will simply erode on their own. Even more disturbing is the report that many agencies will additionally be removing the regional authority which exists in the regional offices. That is a greater problem because it further removes the ability of Government agencies to take action. An example from my district is the authority which exists at the region 10 office of the Environmental Protection Agency. With one of the largest Superfund sites in the Nation located in Tacoma, WA, it was primarily because some regional authority existed in Seattle that anything was done to begin cleaning up this site, especially during the turbulent times of the Gorsuch tenure in Washington, DC. With the shift of the regional EPA office to San Francisco—as could be envisioned under scenarios now planned by the administration—and with the additional removal of any authority in that San Francisco office, the Environmental Protection Agencies field structure is rendered irrelevant.

Therefore we believe that the Congress must exercise its authority to review any changes in the existing Federal field structure before they are implemented. Up until now, the Presidential directive which created the 10-region structure does not specifically allow congressional review because it was not created by statutory language. This legislation we are introducing today resolves that problem by putting the language of OMB Circular A-105, which regulates agency field office structure, into law. In doing so, it provides that Congress shall have the authority to review any proposal to consolidate or eliminate any regional office. At a time when plans for a large-scale dismantling of the Federal agency field structure are being considered by David Stockman and other budget officials, we need that authority now more than ever.●

THE BEAVER VALLEY EXPRESSWAY

HON. JOE KOLTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to correct a situation that has been neglected for too long. This legislation will authorize construction of a highway project in the Beaver and Lawrence Counties of Pennsylvania known as the "Beaver Valley Expressway" or Route 60.

The Beaver Valley Expressway is a "missing link" in the economic evolution of Beaver and Lawrence Counties. A distance of 15 miles is the only thing which stands in the way of a beginning for economic recovery.

As a direct result of this missing link, thousands of acres of land with vast potential lie dormant and unproductive.

While many of you may very well be experiencing the benefits of an improved economy, my district has not been as fortunate.

The Beaver Valley has an unlimited, and unfortunately, untapped number of valuable resources. The Beaver Valley Expressway's missing link is an essential lifeline that will help pull the entire region from the depths of economic recession

To finish this desperately needed project, I need the help of my honored colleagues in the House. It is my sincere hope that you will hear our need and lend a hand through your cosponsorship of my legislation to complete Route 60.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

A BILL TO IMPROVE STATE CRIMINAL JUSTICE INFORMATION SYSTEMS

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Criminal Justice Information Improvement Act of 1985, a bill designed to improve State criminal justice information systems, including criminal history records; to establish an interstate identification index based on criminal records and to provide assistance to States to use such index; to ensure that criminal history records are accurate and complete; and for other purposes.

Crime rates have soared across the Nation in the past two decades, rising 200 percent since 1960. One way State law-enforcement officials have tried to meet this growing crime threat is by increased reliance on high-tech crime fighting methods. Computers have become an important tool in fighting crime effectively because they can provide instant access to important information.

However, because of insufficient funding and interstate coordination, much of the data contained in States' crime-fighting computer data bases are inaccurate. In particular, the accuracy and completeness of criminal history record information has emerged as one of the most significant information issues confronting the criminal justice community.

Criminal history records are the most widely used records within the criminal justice process. Law enforcement officials, for example, use criminal history records for a variety of investigative purposes, as well as for assistance in making arrest decisions. Prosecutors use criminal history record information to assist in making decisions about charging and prosecuting arrestees, as well as in plea bargaining negotiations. Judges use criminal history record information in shaping their recommendations and decisions. Finally, statisticians and researchers depend upon criminal record information as a feedstock for statistics and analysis which, in turn, inform and guide policymakers and the public.

In addition, criminal history records are widely used for noncriminal justice purposes. For example, they may be available to Federal agencies for security clearance and personnel suitability decisions; to Federal and State agencies for licensing decisions; to public and private employers for employment decisions; and to a countless variety of private sector decision makers for use in insurance, credit, housing, and other important decisions.

Numerous studies have shown that there are serious problems with the quality of criminal history records maintained in Federal, State, and local record systems. The most serious shortcoming is the lack of speedy and accurate disposition reporting. Yet the technology and methodology exists to achieve complete records. We should not be satisfied until 100 percent complete records are achieved.

Basic fairness demands that the Government not rely upon inaccurate or incomplete information to make decisions about individuals. The Supreme Court declared as long ago as 1948 that the use of erroneous criminal history record information for sentencing purposes violates an individual's fifth amendment due process rights. Also, to the extent that incomplete or inaccurate criminal histories falsely overstate a record subject's criminal activities, that person suffers damage to his or her reputation and privacy interests. Moreover, a person in this situation may be unfairly harmed in applications for licenses, jobs, government benefits, and so forth. Finally, criminal justice agencies are hampered by inaccurate or incomplete records. One very clear example of this is the frequency with which courts overturn convictions because the original arrest or search was made on the basis of erroneous criminal justice information.

The Criminal Justice Information Improvement Act of 1985 is designed to address this problem by improving the quality and flow of information. The bill sets up an interstate identification index under the Attorney General in order to help Federal, State, and local agencies to share criminal identification and crime records. The bill provides funding for States to participate in the index and to update their criminal history records. At the same time, it requires States receiving these funds to meet standards for accuracy, timeliness, and completeness of criminal history information.

I urge my colleagues to support this effort to help Federal, State, or local officials to use technology wisely, both to curb crime and to protect the privacy and rights of citizens.

The text of the bill follows:

H.R. 896

A bill to improve State criminal justice information systems, including criminal history records; to establish an interstate identification index based on criminal records and to provide assistance to States to use such index; to ensure that criminal history records are accurate and complete; and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Criminal Justice Information Improvement Act of 1985".

INTERSTATE IDENTIFICATION INDEX

SEC. 2. Section 534 of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by redesignating subsection (c) as subsection (d), and

(2) by inserting after subsection (b) the following new subsection:

"(c)(1) For the purpose of assisting Federal, State, and local departments and agencies to locate, for criminal justice use, criminal identification and crime records held by such departments and agencies, the Attorney General shall—

"(A) establish and maintain an interstate identification index which shall contain only information—

"(i) identifying individuals with respect to whom there exists any criminal identification or crime record;

"(2) with respect to each such individual, identifying the Federal, State, and local departments and agencies which created and hold criminal identification and crime records; and

"(iii) with respect to each such individual, indicating whether the Attorney General holds any such record; and

"(B) make such information available to such departments and agencies for criminal justice use.

"(2) The Attorney General may make available information in the interstate identification index to any State or local department or agency for criminal justice use only if—

"(A) such department or agency has not obtained information under this subsection at any time preceding the 3-year period ending on the date any such information was first requested under this subsection; or

"(B) in the case of a department or agency which obtained information under this subsection in such 3-year period, such department or agency complied with section 4 of the Criminal Justice Information Improvement Act of 1984 during a period of not less than 180 days ending on the date of the current request of such department or agency for information.".

AMENDMENTS TO OMNIBUS CRIME CONTROL AND SAFE STREETS ACT OF 1968

SEC. 3. (a) Section 401(a) of title I of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (42 U.S.C. 3741(a)) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (22) by striking out "and" at the end thereof,

(2) in paragraph (23) by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon, and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(24) developing capabilities necessary to submit information for inclusion in, and to obtain information contained in, the interstate identification index established under section 534(c)(2)(B) of title 28, United States Code; and

"(25) complying with the requirements of section 534(c)(3) of title 28, United States Code, and section 4 of the Criminal Justice Information Improvement Act of 1984.".

(b) Section 401(b) of title I of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (42 U.S.C. 3741(b)) is amended—

(1) in subparagraph (A) by striking out "and" at the end thereof,

(2) in subparagraph (B)—

(A) by inserting "except as provided in subparagraph (C)," after "(B)", and

(B) by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof "; and", and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(C) for any fiscal period beginning after the effective date of this subparagraph, that portion of a Federal grant made under paragraph (20) for the purpose of establishing a criminal justice information system or under paragraph (24) or (25) shall be 100 per centum of the cost of the program or project specified in the application for such grant.".

(c) Section 402 of title I of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (42 U.S.C. 3742(b)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) No eligible jurisdiction may receive finanical assistance under this part for the purpose of establishing a criminal justice information system or for any purpose specified in paragraph (24) or (25) of section 401 unless such jurisdiction agrees, as a condition of receiving such assistance, to comply with section 4 of the Criminal Justice Information Improvement Act of 1984 not later than 3 years after first receiving assistance under this Act for any such purpose.".

CRIMINAL HISTORY RECORDS

SEC. 4. (a) For purposes of section 534(c)(2)(B) of title 28, United States Code, and section 402(e) of title I of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (42 U.S.C. 3742(e)), a State or local department or agency or an eligible jurisdiction, as the case may be, shall—

(1) comply with sections 20.3, 20.20 (without regard to subsection (a)), 20.21 (without regard to the requirement that a plan be submitted or amended), and 20.24 of title 28 of the Code of Federal Regulations as in effect on the date of the enactment of this Act, and

(2) permit the Attorney General of the United States, or the designee of the Attorney General, to audit the criminal justice and related records of such department, agency, or jurisdiction to verify such compliance.

(b) The Attorney General of the United States shall conduct audits of the type described in subsection (a)(2) on a random basis to ensure that State and local departments and agencies and eligible jurisdictions to which such subsection applies comply with such subsection.

NATIONAL CRIME INFORMATION ADVISORY POLICY BOARD

SEC. 5. (a) There is hereby established in the Department of Justice a National Crime Information Advisory Board (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "Board") whose purpose it shall be to recommend to the Attorney General general policies with respect to—

(1) the philosophy, concept, and operational principles applicable to the acquisition, classification, storage, and dissemination of information, and the exchange and use of records made available, by the Attorney General under section 534 of title 28, United States Code, and

(2) the relationship of the activities of the Attorney General under such section to State and local systems relating to the collection, processing, storage, dissemination, and use of criminal history information and records.

(b) The Board shall be composed of 26 members as follows:

(1) Six members shall be appointed by the Attorney General. At least 1 of such members shall be appointed from among each of the following—

(A) individuals representing the judiciary,

(B) attorneys who prosecute criminal defendants,

(C) attorneys who provide legal counsel to criminal defendants,

(D) individuals representing administrators of correctional institutions and agencies, and

(E) individuals representing civil rights organizations.

Such members shall serve for an indeterminate period of time.

(2) Twenty members shall be elected by entities throughout the United States which obtain information under such section from the Attorney General. Such members shall serve for a term of two years beginning on January 5th of each odd numbered year.

(3) The Board shall be representative of the entire criminal justice community at the State and local levels and shall include representation from law enforcement agencies, the courts, and corrections agencies and institutions.

(c) The Board shall review rules and procedures applicable to carrying out section 534 of title 28, United States Code.

(d) The Board shall consider operational needs of criminal justice departments and agencies in light of public policies, and local State, and Federal statutes.

(e)(1) The Board shall review, on a continuing basis, security and privacy aspects of operations carried out under section 534 of title 28, United States Code, and shall, as needed, appoint ad hoc subcommittees to provide information and recommendations to the Board regarding the security and privacy aspects of such operations.

(2) The Board shall recommend standards for participation by criminal justice departments and agencies in such operations.

(f) The Board shall report directly to the Attorney General of the United States or to the designee of the Attorney General.

(g) The Federal Advisory Committee Act shall apply with respect to the Board (5 U.S.C. App.).

EFFECTIVE DATES

SEC. 6. (a) Except as provided in subsections (b) and (c), this Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) The amendment made by section 3(b)(2) shall take effect on the first day of the first fiscal year beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(c) Section 5 shall take effect on January 5, 1986.●

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE CCC II

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, having served in the Civilian Conservation Corps during the 1930's, I am proud to introduce legislation, H.R. 701, to reestablish it now in the 1980's.

My bill would set up the Civilian Conservation Corps II for the purpose of providing a work force of young people to maintain the natural resources of this Nation. The program would provide employment and experience for its participants, as well as foster the principle and practice of conservation. Preference from employment with the CCC II would be given to minority youth and to youth from areas of high unemployment. Supervisory positions would also be available to older individuals.

My commitment to the CCC is a deep one. During the 1930's, I was the victim of the greatest period of unemployment this country has ever experienced: The Great Depression. The CCC provided work, perhaps the greatest possible relief during these economically desperate times. And, more importantly, it gave me a cause to which I could wholeheartedly commit myself. Instilling in me a deep sense of pride and dignity that so many around me had lost, the CCC provided the inspiration and the means for attending college. It also provided the impetus for my long career in public service.

Many young people today are experiencing difficulties similar to those facing me during the Depression. They desperately need a program like the CCC to take that first step from poverty, chronic unemployment and despair to job training, higher education, and hope for the future.

There is support for the CCC II both in Congress and throughout the country. Last year, both the House and the Senate overwhelmingly passed legislation calling for the establishment of a youth conservation corps, but President Reagan vetoed the measure. I have heard from many groups across the country which would strongly support the program. One fine example is the CCC Historic Center in Sacramento, CA. The center was set up by individuals, like myself, who served in the CCC in the 1930's. Its purpose is to honor those who served in the CCC and to educate many of the younger generation who are unaware of the significance and accomplishments of the Corps. Such groups would do everything they could to make the CCC II a success.

The President seems to believe that both the youth unemployment problem and management of our natural resources can be best handled by the private sector. I disagree. I believe that we must address this problem directly and that one fine way to do so would be through the enactment of this legislation. I urge you all to join me in establishing the CCC II, and making it even more successful than its predecessor.●

HARLON CARTER'S 10 YEARS OF SERVICE TO THE NRA

HON. RON MARLENEE

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, January 26, Harlon B. Carter stepped down as executive vice president of the National Rifle Association, an organization of nearly 3 million men, women, and children who are dedicated to preserving the principles for which our flag stands.

For the past 10 years, Harlon Carter has been a name and a man that Members of Congress have associated with the National Rifle Association. It was he who led the NRA into the legislative arena. Under Harlon Carter, the NRA became synonymous with the concept of "grassroots lobbying." The NRA, it is fair to say, wrote the book on uniting men, women, and children of every city, town and village across the Nation into the single most effective organization representing the American gunowner and hunter. And, again, much credit belongs to Harlon Carter.

I'm sure that anyone who knows Harlon Carter would agree with my portrait of him. They would say that as impressive a man, politically, intellectually, ethically, and in terms of his achievements in the area of law enforcement and competitive shooting that Harlon Carter is, he is above all else a humble and sensitive man who would decline the honors due him. If I or anyone else said that under Harlon Carter, the NRA grew from less than a million to nearly 3 million members, that its programs of firearm safety have flourished across the land, that the number of competitive tournaments sanctioned by the NRA grew from 3,800 to nearly 11,000 annually, that not one single piece of legislation designed to diminish law abiding citizens rights to keep and bear arms passed from this or any other Congress sitting during his tenure at the NRA, he would object.

Harlon Carter would point to the "fine, bright, enthusiastic" staff headquartered at 1600 Rhode Island Avenue and in the various branch offices across the Nation. He would point to the nearly 3 million Americans who rally when their rights are threatened, who write and phone their elected officials, who work the polls and cast their ballots for those of us who work to insure that the Bill of Rights remains intact. He would say that the NRA united and strong, not he, is due the credit for not only a decade but 114 years of service to the Nation. And, of course, Harlon would be right.

Those of us who are members of the NRA bear our membership as we bear our citizenship, with pride. As NRA members we work and walk in our communities a little taller and a little stronger not because we feel smug or superior but because we have pledged to accept the responsibility that comes with citizenship to dedicate ourselves to the vigilance necessary to defend our constitutionally guaranteed second amendment rights long held as the keystone of all our liberties. We are proud to proclaim that we are citizens of the United States of America and that we are the NRA. None among us stands as the very embodiment of that pride, resolve, and dedication more than Harlon Carter.

Members of Congress of both Houses and on both sides of the aisle know and respect Harlon Carter. He served the Nation for 34 years as an outstanding example of the fine men and women who daily guard our borders with the U.S. Border Patrol. He was Chief of the Border Patrol. And he was a Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and Border Patrol for the southwest region. He retired from Federal law enforcement in 1970.

He holds some 44 national shooting records won with pistols, military rifles and smallbore rifles. He is one of but 22 civilians who was awarded the Department of the Army's Distinguished Award for marksmanship excellence for both rifle and pistol in 100 years. And his prowess with rifle, pistol, and shotgun in the field has earned him the respect of his fellow hunters throughout the world.

Harlon Carter's full career and rich legacy as leader of the Nation's most powerful hunting and gunowner organization in the minds of most would pose a formidable precedent that would make the task of finding a successor a near impossibility. To the credit of the National Rifle Association, they did indeed chose a man worthy to follow in Harlon Carter's shoes. That man is G. Ray Arnett.

Ray Arnett is an imposing man. Physically he overshadows most in this Capital City. As the new executive vice president of the NRA he will cast a shadow the length and breadth of the land in championing the rights of Americans to hunt and own and use guns for a multitude of legitimate reasons.

Ray Arnett is well known and well respected by friend and foe alike. As Assistant Secretary of Interior for Fish, Wildlife and Parks, Ray was a tough and capable administrator of the Nation's natural resources. He fought for all Americans. And, during a time when it has become politically fashionable to curry favor with the media and those who would end hunting and gun ownership, Ray Arnett stood tall as the hunters' and gunowners' friend in Washington.

I've had the pleasure of working with Ray on matters of critical concern to the Nation's wildlife resources. I know that he is a worthy ally, one that by force of will and the rightness of his cause will continue to fight until the rights of all hunters' and gunowners' are strictly protected.

I hope that in someway I've demonstrated the honor due Harlon Carter and my faith that the vision held for the National Rifle Association by Harlon Carter will be carried proudly by my friend, Ray Arnett.●

CONGRATULATIONS TO THOMAS V. OGDEN ON HIS 90TH BIRTHDAY

HON. GENE CHAPPIE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. CHAPPIE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Thomas V. Ogden, a long-time resident of northern California, who has recently celebrated a milestone. On January 10, of this new year, Tom became 90 years old, and I want to take this opportunity to join the many others in wishing him a happy birthday. Tom has worked and played an important role in northern California for many years and is very deserving of the praise he has received during his birthday celebration.

As a veteran firefighter in the city of Santa Ana, Tom risked his life on numerous occasions to save and protect others. This trait, of sacrificing to help others, has been a trademark of Tom's for many years. Besides working for others as a firefighter, Tom has been a member of the Elks Club for 50 years. During this time, Tom participated in many projects to raise money and assist his community in any way he could. Today, the results of Tom's work can be found throughout the neighborhood where he spent his life serving the people.

Tom's interests also extend into the field of politics. Tom was one who was never afraid to voice his opinion on a subject and never backed down from a fight. His main interests were not to further his own political interests, but to work for the benefit of the people and the community as a whole. From this we can all learn a lesson. Today, Tom resides in Los Molinos, CA, and I feel honored and privileged to represent him and the rest of Los Molinos in the 99th Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and the rest of the House of Representatives to join me in congratulating Thomas Ogden on the celebration of his 90th birthday and to wish him many more birthdays in the future.●

THE NUCLEAR EXPLOSIVES CONTROL ACT OF 1985

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to introduce today a bill which seeks to tackle one of most complicated and pressing problems affecting American and world security for the foreseeable future—the proliferation of nuclear technology, equipment, and materials that can be applied to making nuclear weapons. This legislation, the Nuclear Explosives Control Act of 1985, is identical to legislation introduced in the last Congress by Congressman Dick Ottinger. The need to strengthen U.S. nonproliferation laws is even greater today than it was 2 years ago. Recent developments and a close examination of the policies pursued over the past 4 years by the administration reveal not only a troubling lack of U.S. leadership in combating nuclear weapons proliferation, but a perceptible relaxation in the official American posture toward the risk posed by nuclear proliferation. I urge my colleagues to support the original intent of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Act of 1978 which established the United States as a world leader in setting high standards in the area of nonproliferation by which other countries could measure their own conduct. I think it may be most effective to quote directly from Mr. Ottinger's statement from May 18, 1983 to emphasize the necessity of this legislation. Also a summary of the bill follows:

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, today, on the ninth anniversary of India's detonation of a so-called "peaceful nuclear explosive," I am submitting a bill which is badly needed to strengthen the Nuclear Nonproliferation Act of 1978. * * *

My deepest concern is over the direction taken by the Reagan administration in promoting nuclear commerce and trade that will surely contribute to the rapid spread of nuclear weapons throughout the world. I urge Members to give their immediate and personal attention to these matters and to support our proposal as contained in the legislation being jointly introduced today in the House and the Senate.

The most dramatic and dangerous departure from past policy is the Reagan administration's active promotion of plutonium, a nuclear explosive material, as a civilian fuel. By actively promoting commercial development of breeder reactors and reprocessing plants at home and abroad, it is paving the way for an industrial process that will produce, by the ton, plutonium that can be used by the pound to make atomic bombs. Although this policy may be responsive to certain industrial interests, it is contrary to the best interests of the nuclear industry and it is certainly anathema to the public interest. Unless the Congress takes immediate steps to reverse this policy, the United States will be exporting the very technologies and materials that can be turned into weapons of mass destruction and used against us.

I urge my colleagues to heed the fact that the global spread of nuclear weapons poses a grave danger to the United States and to the entire world, rivaling that of the arms race between the superpowers. * * * In addition, we are not at all reassured by President Reagan's recent statement that "we are pretty well on our way to, if not, entirely eliminating nuclear proliferation, holding it down to where a country might have a weapon or two, but they are not going to have enough to threaten the world." In fact, as was shown with small nuclear devices used at Hiroshima and Nagasaki, just one bomb can wreak devastation and destruction and result in an enormous loss of life. A weapon of that size would likely kill the entire 10 million population of metropolitan New York.

As the number of nations possessing nuclear weapons grow, so does the likelihood that nuclear weapons will be used—possibly in a regional conflict that could engulf the superpowers and result in world nuclear war. Our concern is that the policies now being carried out by the administration are directly and significantly contributing to the perilous process of proliferation. It is unreasonable to expect that a nation, once having acquired a weapon or two, will not proceed to develop a substantial arsenal, along with the means for delivering those weapons, or that other nations, especially regional rivals, will not soon follow suit or that such weapons will not be used or fall into the hands of unscrupulous terrorist groups. If the administration continues to act as if proliferation is inevitable, of course it will be.

In a July 16, 1981, policy statement on nonproliferation, the Reagan administration announced some laudatory objectives: "* * * the need to prevent the spread of nuclear explosives to additional countries * * * to inhibit the transfer of sensitive nuclear material, equipment, and technology * * * requiring—international—safeguards on all nuclear activities in a non-nuclear-weapon state as a condition for any significant new nuclear supply commitment." However, the policy is rendered self-contradictory and self-defeating by the further declaration that the administration would "not inhibit or set back civil reprocessing and breeder reactor development abroad in nations with advanced nuclear power programs where it does not constitute a proliferation risk."

The Reagan administration's policy also advocates improving regional and global stability in order to reduce "motivations that can drive countries toward nuclear explosives." But while conflict resolution should be an important objective in U.S. foreign policy, it is no substitute over the long run for preventing the introduction of nuclear explosive materials into international commerce. The cause of regional and global stability is best served by keeping nuclear bomb materials out of as many nations as possible.

In our judgment, the administration's policy has had precisely the opposite effect. It has hastened the proliferation of nuclear weapons by:

First, actively promoting U.S. exports of the enrichment and reprocessing technologies needed to produce weapons-usable uranium and plutonium. This constitutes a complete reversal of the policy and practice of the U.S. Government from the birth of the nuclear age until President Reagan took office.

Second, approving foreign reprocessing of plutonium from U.S.-origin spent fuel despite the fact that the IAEA has publicly declared that the international safeguards system is incapable of providing timely warning of a diversion of this material from civilian to weapons purposes.

Third, offering no incentives for other countries to forgo the use of plutonium fuel and, in fact, encouraging plutonium use abroad by means of our own domestic example of championing commercial development of breeder reactors and reprocessing plants.

Fourth, exploiting loopholes in the Nuclear Nonproliferation Act by approving export of nuclear and dual-use items to nations that refuse to accept international safeguards on all their nuclear activities. These nations, which refuse to ratify the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and are most suspected to developing nuclear weapons, include Argentina, Brazil, India, Pakistan, and South Africa. In those instances where the act strictly forbids certain nuclear exports to such countries, the administration has found other nations, less committed to nonproliferation, to serve as alternative suppliers of these items.

Fifth, continuing to export highly enriched uranium, an atom bomb material, for use in research reactors while cutting back on U.S. programs to develop alternative low-enriched fuels not suitable for weapons in these reactors.

Sixth, eliminating restrictions on economic and military assistance to Pakistan's obvious nuclear weapons program, and failing to make clear that development of a nuclear weapon by any country will result in a cutoff of all forms of assistance to that country.

To the often heard argument that restrictions on nuclear commerce are useless because if we do not sell dangerous materials, equipment, others will: the argument ignores the effectiveness of previous administration's nonproliferation efforts to halt the sale of reprocessing technology from France to Pakistan and Germany to Brazil. The efforts of past administrations to oppose such transfers were successful until President Reagan introduced his new policy to have the United States set an example of exportation rather than restraint.

In order to remedy these dangerous flaws in the administration's conduct of nuclear commerce with other nations, we are introducing today the "Nuclear Explosives Control Act of 1983." This legislation strengthens the earlier Nonproliferation Act in the following ways:

First, banning U.S. exports of enrichment and reprocessing technology.

Second, establishing a moratorium on foreign reprocessing of plutonium from U.S.-origin spent fuel, other than for limited research and development and demonstration facilities for which commitments have already been made. Use of this plutonium in large commercial powerplants—breeders or otherwise—would be prohibited. Reprocessing of plutonium from U.S.-origin spent fuel for other than R&D purposes could not proceed until Congress determined that effective international safeguards will be applied and that effective sanctions exist against violations.

Third, requiring the United States to offer—as an incentive for other nations to forego plutonium—uranium enrichment services at a discounted price for the production of low enriched uranium (unsuitable for weapons) fuel. As a further inducement, the United States would offer assistance in the management of unreprocessed spent fuel, in developing alternative sources of energy, and in providing existing nuclear powerplants with improved nuclear fuel to increase reactor efficiency. This assistance would stretch out the supply nonweapons usable uranium and reduce inventories of plutonium left as a byproduct in spent nuclear fuel.

Fourth, closing loopholes in the Nuclear Nonproliferation Act by requiring uniform, strict criteria to govern export actions of all Federal agencies. At present, only the Nuclear Regulatory Commission is required to halt exports to nations that refuse to accept international safeguards on all their activities; under the new law, the Energy and Commerce Departments would be under the same restrictions. This would prevent nuclear and dual-use items from being exported to nations suspected of developing nuclear weapons. This provision also would prevent U.S. companies from using foreign affiliates to engage in nuclear trade with countries with which the American companies are barred from trading. In addition, the Defense Department would, for the first time, be required to approve from the national security standpoint nuclear exports approved by other Federal agencies.

Fifth, barring U.S. exports of highly enriched uranium as soon as foreign research reactors can use alternative fuels unsuitable for nuclear weapons. This provision also would accelerate the U.S. program for developing such alternative fuels.

Sixth, strengthening sanctions to require an automatic cut-off of all nuclear and other assistance to nations that explode nuclear devices.

The legislation introduced today would redirect U.S. nuclear policy away from the path of proliferation and onto a course of prudence and sanity. I urge you to support the legislation and the sound policy it embodies. * * *

THE NUCLEAR EXPLOSIVES CONTROL ACT OF 1985

The bill has three principal objectives:

I. To discourage and sharply restrict commerce in nuclear-explosive materials—plutonium and highly enriched uranium;

II. To offer other nations positive incentives, in the form of nuclear-fuel assurances and technical assistance, to forego the use of plutonium and highly enriched uranium in their nuclear programs;

III. To strengthen nuclear-export criteria for all Federal agencies to ensure that nuclear exports go only to nations that accept international safeguards inspections of all their nuclear activities ("full-scope safeguards") and have nuclear-cooperation agreements with the United States.

I. RESTRICTIONS ON NUCLEAR-EXPLOSIVE MATERIALS

Bans U.S. exports of civilian technology and equipment that are important to the construction of enrichment, reprocessing and heavy water plants essential to the production of nuclear explosive materials (section 4);

Defers foreign extraction (reprocessing) of plutonium from nuclear fuel provided by the United States for commercial activities until such time as Congress determines adequate international safeguards and sanctions are in place (section 5);

Requires the phasing out of U.S. exports of highly enriched uranium as soon as research reactors can be operated with lower enriched fuel unsuitable for nuclear weapons (section 6);

Requires Federal agencies to improve physical security arrangements for nuclear exports (section 11);

Strengthens the process in existing law for cutting off nuclear trade with nations that develop or assist other nations in developing nuclear weapons or that violate safeguards or other fundamental nonproliferation commitments (section 19);

II. NUCLEAR-FUEL ASSURANCES AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Offers to nations which agree to forego development of reprocessing and enrichment facilities, as well as to forego the use of separated plutonium, the following major incentives (section 8):

A substantial discount on the price of U.S. uranium enrichment services for low-enriched uranium fuel, which is unsuitable for nuclear weapons;

A further discount on the enrichment price for nations agreeing to run reactors on specially improved low-enriched fuel that conserves uranium, reduces spent fuel generation and lowers the production of residual, by-product plutonium;

A single export license to assure supplies of low-enriched uranium fuel sufficient to meet the lifetime requirements of all their nuclear powerplants—the fuel to be provided in shipments sufficient to operate each plant for three years at a time;

Technical assistance to increase the fuel efficiency of light water reactors and thereby reduce inventories of residual, by-product plutonium;

Technical assistance to resolve nuclear-waste management problems, including the storage and disposal of spent fuel;

Technical assistance in developing alternative energy sources.

III. STRENGTHENED NUCLEAR EXPORT CRITERIA

Upgrades export criteria for the Energy and Commerce Departments to ensure that exports of nuclear technology and "dual-use" items go only to nations that accept full-scope safeguards and have a nuclear-cooperation agreement with the United States—the same strict standard that now governs Nuclear Regulatory Commission licensing of nuclear-reactor and fuel exports (sections 13, 14 and 16);

Establishes the same strict standards for NRC export licensing of nuclear components as now exist for NRC export licensing of complete reactors and fuel (section 17);

Requires that nuclear transfers by foreign affiliates of U.S. companies are subject to the same requirements as transfers directly from U.S.-based firms (section 18);

Requires the Secretary of Defense to play a key nonproliferation role in determining that proposed nuclear agreements, exports and arrangements are not inimical to the common defense and security (section 15);

Requires that U.S. origin nuclear materials cannot be substituted for nuclear materials not under the control of the United States without the approval of the Secretary of Energy (section 7).●

BIRMINGHAM WILL MISS MRS. JESSIE LEE BEAVERT

HON. BEN ERDREICH

OF ALABAMA

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, Birmingham, AL, which I represent, recently lost a citizen whose concern for the city and those who live there set an example of commitment to community involvement to which we should all aspire.

Mrs. Jessie Lee Beavert was a doer. Not one to be content merely complaining about her community, Mrs. Beavert set about the task of making her community better by actively pursuing solutions and helping the city progress.

She was past president of the Eastern Area Chamber of Commerce and was named Eastern Area Citizen of the Year. She was a member and past president of Huffman Business and Professional Women and was president of the Birmingham chapter of the National Association of Remodeling Industry. She was also a member of the executive board of directors of the Vacca Campus.

Last year, I presented Mrs. Beavert with a congressional commendation for her outstanding efforts as a national officer and local coordinator of the National Block Watch Association, a nationwide effort to encourage greater citizen and neighborhood participation in the fight against crime. On the evening of August 7, 1984, in Jefferson County, AL, and across the Nation, citizen volunteers participated in "National Night Out," a volunteer effort in which watch vigils were conducted to make neighborhoods and property safer from those who would steal or vandalize. Mrs. Beavert coordinated 500 neighborhood watch captains throughout the city of Birmingham. Her efforts spread the word that simple vigilance can help protect lives and property.

Jessie Lee Beavert did much more than talk about what needed to be done to improve her city and help her fellow citizens. Her life was a shining example of the good that concern and commitment can accomplish. She was loved and will be missed by her community.●

LOW-INCOME STUDENT ASSISTANCE MUST BE IMPROVED

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would amend the Food Stamp Act of 1977 to exclude from household income the actual and reasonable expenses incurred by household members of books and transportation incidental to attending school.

As the current law reads, educational loans on which payment is deferred, grants, scholarships, fellowships, veterans' educational benefits, and the like—to the extent that they are used for tuition and mandatory school fees—are excluded as income, and therefore do no detract from food stamp aid that a family may be receiving.

By definition, mandatory school fees are those charged to all students or those charged to all students within a certain curriculum. For example, uniforms, lab fees, or equipment charged to all students to enroll in a chemistry course would be considered mandatory school fees, and thus would be excluded as income. However, transportation, supplies, and textbook expenses which are not uniformly charged to all students, would not be considered mandatory school fees, and thus—as income—would limit food stamps available to the family.

Anyone who has attended an educational facility where books need be purchased or rented knows the tremendous cost that this can incur within a short period of time. This is especially true in institutions of higher education where anywhere from 1 to 15 texts may be required for one course. While utilization of the school library may be substituted for purchase in a few of these cases, such a recourse is not always advisable or possible.

It is necessary in many instances for the student to purchase the texts required to take full advantage of the course. However, when money received to pay for the purchase of those books detracts from aid to the family, it becomes necessary for either the student's education or the family's welfare to be compromised.

Therefore, because the intent of the Food Stamp Act was and is to aid the needy, I urge my collegues to join me in eradicating this educational barrier to America's underprivileged youth. My bill will exclude book purchase and rental costs—in addition to reasonable transportation costs—as income. Since the Food Stamp Act stipulates that the receipt of food stamps be based on household members only, the transportation costs in my bill would be commuter fees, not transportation to or from an educational facility at which the student was planning to live while attending school. This bill should alleviate much of the burden that has been placed on the family, without excluding unreasonable transportation costs as income.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the intent behind the Food Stamp Act was to penalize needy families for educational opportunities which their children may receive. If we allow this unfortunate circumstance to continue, we are undermining the chance for many individuals to become self-supporting through opportunities that are provided by a good education. I invite my colleagues to join me in this effort to alleviate some of the burden which has been placed on many needy American families, thus providing America's underprivileged youth the hope to work for a better tomorrow.●

AMENDMENT TO ADMINISTRATION OF WINDFALL PROFIT TAX ACT OF 1980

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing my bill from the 98th Congress, H.R. 5934, which revises the basis for issuing notices of deficiency and determining the judicial review of "oil item" issues under the Crude Oil Windfall Tax Act of 1980.

This bill merely implements two legislative recommendations of the GAO. As the GAO reported to the Congress:

NOTICES OF TAX DUE

The Congress should expand IRS' authority to issue notices of additional tax due as a result of examinations of oil properties. IRS presently is limited by law to the issuance of a single notice of tax due per taxpayer each year. Thus, issuance of notices of tax due with respect to a single oil-producing property in any given year means that IRS would be prohibited from issuing the subject taxpayers any further notices that year.

Yet many producer-taxpayers invest in multiple oil properties managed by different parties. IRS thus has found it necessary to refrain from issuing notices until it has consolidated the results of numerous examinations of oil properties. If IRS were able to issue notices of tax due after each examination, both the government and taxpayers could benefit. The government would benefit from faster collection of additional taxes due; taxpayers would benefit from reduced interest charges on any additional tax they must pay.

COURT APPEALS

The Congress also should modify the law governing court appeals of IRS decisions. Under present law, each individual producer in an oil property has the right to appeal any IRS decision to the courts. Where individual circumstances can vary, this appeal right is both necessary and appropriate. But there are certain oil property-related issues which do not vary from one individual producer to another.

For example, the kind of oil obtained from a particular well necessarily is the same for all producers owning an interest in that well. Therefore, it is inefficient and duplicative to allow each individual producer to appeal that issue separately to the courts. Accordingly, there is a need for legislation to prevent duplicative court appeals.

The Department of the Treasury agrees with the GAO's legislative proposals to the Congress, and has suggested amendments to the Internal Revenue Code that would incorporate them.

I hope that these statutory changes will strengthen the IRS' ability to successfully administer the windfall profit tax, and in so doing, enhance voluntary compliance with our tax laws.

The integrity of our tax base is a matter of vital concern to every American. Therefore, we should fully support this timely tax reform initiative.●

INTERNAL REVENUE CODE AMENDMENTS

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I have re-introduced legislation, H.R. 734, to amend the Internal Revenue Code to exempt certain emergency transportation of individuals from the excise tax on transportation by air. Also, this bill calls for the exemption from excise tax on air transportation for helicopters not using or benefiting by federally assisted facilities.

Presently, injured or ill persons that require air transportation to medical facilities are charged with an 8 percent excise tax on the cost of their flight. These flights are often not covered by insurance and must be paid for out of the individual's or family's personal income. This is a burden to people already facing a costly and emotionally difficult situation. The average air medical transport costs between $2,000 and $3,000. Eight percent of this cost can be substantial to individuals paying the tax. However, the amount of revenue gained by the Treasury is likely to be minimal due to the relatively few number of air medical transports.

To insure that this exemption is not abused by individuals using commercial airlines for travel to medical facilities, this bill states that the exemption applies only for transportation of an injured or ill person by an aircraft which: (1) contains special equipment for purposes of transporting injured or ill persons, or (2) contains seats that may be modified to accommodate a stretcher, and (3) is used predominantly in the transportation of injured or ill persons. This narrow language will limit the exemption to air ambulance travel and prevent the involvement of ordinary passenger commercial airlines.

The remainder of this bill deals with some of the excise taxes on helicopter transportation as imposed by the Airport and Airway Improvement Act of 1982. When Congress passed the act, it believed there was a pressing need to improve our airport and airway systems. It chose to raise the revenue necessary to accomplish this by imposing user fees on fuel, persons, and property. The helicopter service industry sought an exemption from these "user" fees so long as the vehicle did not take off from, or land at, a facility eligible for assistance under the Airport and Airway Development Act of 1970, and did not otherwise use services provided pursuant to the Airport and Airway System Improvement Act during such transportation. The exemption was only granted to the mining and timber industry.

Since the rationale for this exemption lies in the fact that the helicopters are not using or benefiting by facilities assisted by the 1970 and 1982 acts, it seems illogical that other helicopter operations fitting the same user criteria do not qualify for the exemption. This bill seeks to make this exemption logically consistent by exempting all helicopter operations from fuel, persons, and property excise taxes so long as they do not use or benefit by facilities assisted by the 1970 and 1982 acts. User fees should be paid by users and nonusers should be exempt. This simple logic is what this bill hopes to accomplish.●

SOLUTIONS TO THE FEDERAL BUDGET DEFICIT

HON. JIM MOODY

OF WISCONSIN

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, today I will introduce with my colleague, Representative JOHN PORTER, a resolution identifying the need for long-range solutions to the spiraling Federal budget deficit.

As we all know, deficits do not affect merely our parents generation and our generation. On the contrary, budget deficits will have an enormous impact on the lives of our children and our grandchildren. Indeed, a child born this year may have to pay over his or her lifetime as much as $10,000 in extra taxes to cover the interest on this year's budget deficit.

High budget deficits push up interest rates, discouraging private investment. This hurts our economy now, but it also impedes the creation of new jobs. As a result, young Americans and their children will have few employment opportunities available to them. It is already the case that many young couples cannot afford to buy a home in which to raise their families.

We are mortgaging our children's future and, ultimately, our Nation's future by allowing budget deficits to grow out of control.

How we address this crisis, and we must address it in this Congress, will have far-reaching consequences for our young people. This resolution highlights the problems resulting from deficits and, most importantly, calls on the President to provide data on the effects of deficits on Americans of different age groups.

Congress must work from this point to avert greater economic hardship and to promote greater prosperity for all Americans. We hope our colleagues will join us in this effort.●

POETIC JUSTICE DONE TO LOGGING REQUIREMENTS

HON. JOHN P. HAMMERSCHMIDT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues an editorial about the new IRS contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements that recently appeared in a newspaper in my district, and a clever poem written by several of my most creative constituents. This little ditty would be funny if these burdensome requirements weren't such a serious matter.

Let me add that I did not support the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, which gave rise to these regulations, and I have introduced legislation to repeal this unreasonable demand on many of our Nation's taxpayers.

[From the Southwest Times Record, Jan. 10, 1985]

NEW IRS RULES ASKING IMPOSSIBLE

The Internal Revenue Service is giving people nightmares already, and April 15 is months away. And the tax boys are encouraging the very people who support this nation by paying a very large share of all taxes to break the law by imposing impossible rules and regulations that cannot be enforced

Congress, which created the mess, needs to stop this madness NOW!

We are referring to the new IRS regulations on use of company or personal vehicles in work that require detailed daily logs of travel in order to claim reasonable business deductions. Perhaps nothing the IRS and Congress have ever done before compares with this latest encroachment into virtually every movement of free people in a free society.

All "personal" travel in a car or truck used in any large or small business, by salesmen, delivery people, executives, farmers, etc. must not be claimed as business expense under the law. That's not the problem. Until now, people simply claimed 25 percent 100 percent use of vehicles for business purposes and generally tried to be honest. That no longer is good enough.

The new rules force people to maintain elaborate sets of logs and records that border on insanity in the most ridiculous extreme. They raise questions that CPAs and lawyers cannot answer. They make people feel that their government believes they are all thieves and liars. And if allowed to continue, these same stupid rules indeed will turn masses of decent, honest people into technical, it not deliberate, tax cheaters.

If a salesman swings by his apartment to change clothes before calling on a customer and wears those clothes to a private party when he leaves that customer, how much of his travel is personal and how much is business? If a man lives in the country and also works in a factory and has a pickup in which he hauls hay to feed three or four cows, what kind of travel is he supposed to "log in" for the IRS when he goes to the general store and buys both hay and groceries? Is any self-respecting physician going to take the time to "log in" his mileage to a hospital emergency room to treat a bleeding patient before he applies his healing talents? What if surgery requires him to work until normal quitting time and he then drives home? Will a fatigued doctor get out his handy pocket computer and compute what portion of his mileage was business and what portion was personal? If an attorney is asked a legal question by a former or potential client during a private lunch in a restaurant, can he claim the drive to and from the eatery was for business purposes?

Those are not the real issues, of course. The real issue is whether Uncle Sam has any trust at all in the American people. The real issue is that hundreds of IRS bureaucrats will be making hundreds of different, personal judgment calls when they audit taxpayers, and no law in the world can specify all the situations that will be encountered. Of course, the law will not be fairly applied to all taxpayers who use company and personal vehicles in our highly mobile society. Another very real aspect of the new vehicle regulations is that, if actually enforced, they keep people from doing their jobs by making them federal record keepers every working day throughout the year primarily on the employer's time.

Most people want to obey the law, particularly when it comes to paying taxes. It is our opinion that millions of Americans annually overpay state and federal governments when they render their taxes, because they bend over backwards not to break the law.

If the IRS, by imposing impossible restrictions on masses of taxpayers, believes people will simply give up and pay taxes on business use of vehicles, that is wrong morally and every other way!

Congress just once needs to have the guts to stand up and admit it was wrong.

We urge you to write your congressman or senator today and tell him exactly where you stand on the new IRS regulations. If you are too busy filling out your personal/business travel log, at least take the time to clip out this editorial and mail it to a member of Congress. This mess needs to be cleaned up. It stinks.

This short poem was sent to me by several constituents in Paris, AR:

I'm learning how to walk again
It's easier I guess

Than to drive and keep account of miles
For the IRS
I don't get there quite as fast
Or carry near as much
But the government is happy
And it has a common touch
For the world is going much too fast
And we must slow it down
Why that's what all the red tape's for
The bureaucrats have found
So let the liars tell their lies
And auditors talk their talk
I'll just let business go to pot
'Cause it's easier to walk.●

A FEDERAL CHARTER FOR THE ARMY AND NAVY UNION OF THE U.S.A.

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I am reintroducing legislation I first introduced in the 97th Congress to grant a Federal charter to the Army and Navy Union of the U.S.A. This legislation passed the House under suspension on May 7, 1984, but was not considered by the Senate before the 98th Congress adjourned.

Founded in 1886, the Army and Navy Union is the oldest veterans' organization of its type still active in the United States. It is the only veterans' organization in which membership is not limited to any specific form, date, branch, place, or nature of the military service performed.

Incorporated in Ohio in 1888, the Army and Navy Union is dedicated to the preservation of a free and independent United States, and to providing assistance to veterans and their dependents. Since its earliest days, the Army and Navy Union has worked for the enactment of laws to provide adequate pension benefits and medical care for the Nation's veterans.

The Army and Navy Union currently has some 8,400 members and posts in Ohio, New York, Georgia, Indiana, Tennessee, North Carolina, South Carolina, New Jersey, New York, Massachusetts, and the District of Columbia. Members of the Army and Navy Union work on a voluntary basis performing services for veterans and their families.

The Army and Navy Union has a long and illustrious record of service. Forty-one recipients of the Congressional Medal of Honor, including Eddie Rickenbacker and Douglas MacArthur, have held membership in the organization. Other members include President William McKinley, Supreme Court Justice Harold Burton, and Senator Charles Dick of Ohio.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to report that Senator FRANK LAUTENBERG of New Jersey intends to introduce a companion to this bill in the Senate in a few days. A Federal charter for the Army and Navy Union will provide this organization with the recognition it so richly deserves, and I am pleased to be the sponsor in the House of the legislation to grant that charter. Since the House concurred in that judgment last year, I am hopeful that my bill will be approved by this body quickly.●

SID MORRISON COSPONSORS NORTHWEST INTERSTATE COMPACT ON LOW-LEVEL RADIOACTIVE WASTE MANAGEMENT

HON. SID MORRISON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, today I'm happy to join Congressman DANNY AKAKA as a cosponsor of the legislation which grants the consent of Congress to the Northwest interstate compact on low-level radioactive waste management.

I have a longstanding interest in devising an equitable and feasible solution to low-level nuclear waste management. As a former member of the Washington State Legislature, I was a representative to the Western interstate nuclear compact. I now represent a district in central Washington State which includes the 570-square-mile Hanford Nuclear Reservation. Hanford will be the disposal site for the Northwest region; Hanford already accepts over half of the Nation's low-level waste.

I cosponsored last year's consent legislation for the Northwest compact, H.R. 1012, which is identical to this year's bill, and I also testified in support of this legislation before the Energy and Commerce Committee's Subcommittee on Energy Conservation and Power.

I generally support the concept of regional compacts for the disposal of low-level radioactive wastes. The compact strategy represents a viable compromise; it mandates that each State be responsible for the disposal of the low-level waste generated within its borders but also encourages the establishment of regional State compacts to facilitate efficient waste management.

I strongly support the provisions in this consent legislation which adhere to the 1986 exclusion date contained in the Federal enabling statute, Public Law 96-573. After January 1, 1986, any ratified compact can exlude from their regional disposal facility any low-level waste generated outside their region. This is the current Federal law and I believe we must exhaust all reasonable options before Congress extends the statutory deadline beyond 1986. The exclusionary date is the teeth in the act which forces the States to negotiate and consummate regional compacts for disposal of low-level waste.

We must continue to prod States which have not yet ratified compacts to do so and to accept their responsibility to share more equitably the burdens of low-level waste disposal. I am proud that the Northwest compact was the first compact ratified by the States and the first submitted to Congress for consent in 1982. We in the Northwest are committed to the regional approach embodied in the Federal act and we hope other regions will follow our lead.

I fully understand many of the physical, logistical, as well as political impediments which can delay the formation of compacts, particularly in those regions which must site and construct new disposal facilities. Because of this, the 1986 exclusionary date may be unrealistic.

The Northwest has worked with various regions to work out compromises and we are willing to work with all parties involved—including congressional committees—to resolve the exclusionary date issue. But I want to warn all involved that Hanford might help with post-1986 disposal only if we have assurances that other States are expeditiously proceeding in good faith to formulate their own compacts and disposal capacity. We must dissuade the political mentality in which State generators outside the Northwest rely upon the Hanford site for post-1986 disposal and become complacent in their efforts to develop their own compacts and disposal sites.

This bill is a good starting point from which to build a compromise. I urge the various committees to hold hearings as soon as possible.●

A TRIBUTE TO MARK GILBERT, LOCAL HERO

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I call attention to the feat a young resident of Illinois' Fifth Congressional District, which I am privileged to represent, carried out last September, and he is Mark Gilbert.

On September 28, Mark and his friend, Deborah Fico, aged 11, were walking near their school, Davis Elementary, in the Brighton Park community, when a man in a car called out to Deborah. The man claimed that Deborah's mother was hurt and that he had been sent to take her to the hospital.

Mark, from training he received under the Chicago Police Department's "Officer Friendly" program, realized the man's hoax and told Deborah not to go with the man. The man drove away, but returned minutes later. Upon his return, the man knocked Deborah down and started to drag her by the hair into his car. Mark kicked the man in the groin, grabbed Deborah, and started to run. The man threw a brick at the young pair—which hit Mark in the side—and he quickly drove off. However, Mark was alert enough to copy the man's license plate number on his shoe. Mark and Deborah then proceeded to Davis Elementary where the police were contacted. Police credit Mark with quick thinking under adverse conditions in protecting Deborah from further harm and allowing the suspect to be apprehended.

As expected, Chicago city officials were quick to bestow suitable honors on Mark. Twelfth Ward Alderman Al Majerczyk introduced a resolution before the Chicago City Council honoring Mark for his act of heroism. This resolution was presented to Mark by Mayor Harold Washington. Twelfth Ward Democratic Committeeman Robert S. Molaro presented Mark with a $100 U.S. savings bond for his heroic deed. Central Post No. 1028 also presented a citation and U.S. flag to Mark.

Mark provided young people throughout the United States with the lesson of "don't take any chances with strangers." I join with the residents of the Fifth Congressional District in paying tribute to Mark's heroic act.●

U.S. SUPPORT FOR PANAMA

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to voice my support for the Republic of Panama. Last year, the Panamanian people directly elected their President for the first time in 16 years. Recently, I visited Panama with other members of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, and I saw first hand its return to democracy.

President Nicolas Ardito Barletta and his people are an inspiration to other Central American countries to move toward democratic government. They deserve our full support and encouragement.

At a time when Central America is undergoing great instability and violence, Panama remains one of our strongest allies and one of the most stable nations in the region. Its strategic value cannot be overestimated; our ability to defend ourselves and our interests in the Western Hemisphere hinge on the Panama Canal.

A Central America free from communism and Soviet influence is vital to our security. Today we are faced with the choice of honoring our commitment to democracy, or watching our hopes for democracy in Central America die and the security of our Nation erode.

Helping newly formed democracies, like the Republic of Panama, must be one of our top priorities. By assisting their economic stablization and development, we stand the best chance of bringing peace, stability and security to Central America.

President Reagan stated in his February 17, 1984, address to Congress:

> We must face an inescapable reality: We must come to the support of our neighbors . . . unless we act—quickly, humanely and firmly—we shall face a crisis that is much worse for everyone concerned.

I agree with the President's statement, and urge the administration to fund assistance to Panama as much as possible, in these times of fiscal restraint and reduced government spending. America's security and our hopes for democracy should not be shortchanged. Our future and the future of our children is at stake.●

NORTHWEST INTERSTATE COMPACT ON LOW-LEVEL RADIOACTIVE WASTE MANAGEMENT

HON. DANIEL K. AKAKA

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, the legislation I am introducing today is a bill granting the consent of Congress to the Northwest Interstate Compact on Low-Level Radioactive Waste Management. In 1980, Congress passed Public Law 96-573, the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act. In that law, Congress made it national policy that States were to assume the responsibility for disposal of low-level radioactive waste. To aid the States in this matter, Congress proposed that regional interstate compacts be developed for disposal of the low-level waste shipped to a disposal site within the region and to deal with the disposal of any low-level waste shipped to a disposal site within the region from States not included in the regional compact.

Interstate compacts entered into pursuant to the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act of 1980 are required by that law to be consented to by Congress. I am introducing this legislation to obtain congressional consent to the Northwest Interstate Compact. The States of Hawaii, Washington, Oregon, Utah, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, and Alaska comprise this compact region. The compact has been adopted by legislative action in all of the States except Wyoming which has approved the Rocky Mountain Interstate Compact.

This bill does differ in one respect from the Northwest Interstate Compact. It is a change which I believe is essential to national acceptance of the compact. The northwest compact, as ratified by the States in the region, provides that party States can refuse to accept any low-level radioactive waste generated outside of the region after July 1, 1983, except such waste as may be allowed by the northwest compact committee. Such a restriction is authorized by the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act, but may only become effective after January 1, 1986. Rather than seek congressional consent to the proposed exclusionary date of the northwest compact, section 3 of the bill ratifies the January 1, 1986, effectiveness date of Public Law 96-573.

Low-level radioactive waste is a national problem, but is of particular concern to the States of the northwest region. For most of the last decade, only the States of Washington, Nevada, and South Carolina have maintained disposal sites for low-level nuclear wastes. The Hanford, WA, site currently receives approximately 52 percent of the low-level radioactive waste produced in the entire United States. Yet, the northwest region produces less than 4 percent of the Nation's low-level waste. Clearly, there has been an unfair burden placed on the northwest region, particularly the State of Washington.

Mr. Speaker, low-level radioactive waste is an important issue for the citizens of the northwest compact States, and indeed, for the entire country. For too long, the people of the Northwest have shouldered more than their fair share of the responsibility of low-level nuclear waste disposal. Low-level radioactive waste regional compacts provide an equitable solution to the disposal problem. I encourage the most prompt consideration of this legislation.●

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON WOMEN'S BUSINESS OWNERSHIP

OF WISCONSIN

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing with Representatives LINDY BOGGS, PARREN MITCHELL, and JOSEPH ADDABBO a bill to create a 2-year National Commission on Women's Business Ownership. As you may remember, this measure had the bipartisan support of 84 House Members in the last Congress.

The Commission would conduct a comprehensive review of the status of women business owners. It would also make recommendations to the President and Congress regarding improving Federal procurement practices and access to credit for women entrepreneurs.

The creation of the Commission is a necessary and long-overdue step toward a coordinated national effort to improve opportunities for women business owners. This bill is the first of several legislative initiatives I will introduce or cosponsor to address the concerns of women entrepreneurs. I hope our colleagues will consider joining with us as cosponsors.●

DEFICIT REDUCTION SURTAX LEGISLATION

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, Congress and the President must face up to the fiscal facts of life and offer Americans an effective and honest solution to the Nation's deficit troubles. The legislation I am offering provides just such an effective and honest answer to the red ink that threatens our continued economic growth. It provides for a temporary 1 percent surtax on all individual gross income and on corporate gross sales for firms reporting more than $1 billion in sales. The new revenues raised by this measure would be devoted solely to the purpose of reducing the budget deficit, and be placed in a trust fund for this exclusive use. Thus, instead of allowing the deficit to continue to impose a hidden tax on Americans, my bill would require Congress and the President to confront the deficit with an aboveboard surtax that is fair and workable.

Based on the most recent Treasury Department income statistics, the 1-percent surtax on individual gross income and corporate gross sales would raise $145 billion in new revenue over the 3-year life of the tax.

This temporary 1-percent surtax can, therefore, make a significant contribution to deficit-reduction efforts without placing too heavy a burden on individuals or firms. Indeed, a small surtax on the gross income of all individuals distributes the tax burden equitably across all income brackets. And because the tax is placed on gross income, rather than taxable income or tax payments, each taxpayer will only contribute the same 1 percent of his actual income as all other taxpayers, regardless of the amount of tax deductions or credits he is entitled to under the present Tax Code. Likewise, all corporations subject to the surtax will only be required to pay 1 percent of their gross sales in additional tax—no more or no less. Finally, it should be noted that individuals and corporations will share equally in raising the estimated $145 billion in new revenue, with each providing half of that total figure.

In addition, taxpayers who qualify for either the earned income credit or the credit for the elderly or permanently disabled and who comply with the surtax exemption regulations may be entitled to a rebate of the surtax.

Mr. Speaker, in submitting this legislation today, I recognize tht the road back to fiscal responsibility is both long and difficult. However, I also believe that it is crucial that we begin to return to a balanced fiscal program without further delay and with a serious commitment to reversing the ever-increasing cost of Government. My bill sets the stage for such an honest effort to control the national deficit and underscores our determination to end the flood of red ink. I therefore urge my colleagues to give this legislation their prompt and careful consideration and to join me in removing the threat that larger deficits present to our future prosperity.●

A BILL TO EXTEND VETERANS' EDUCATIONAL BENEFITS

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would amend title 38, section 1662 of the United States Code, to extend the time limitation for completing a program of education to veterans of the Vietnam era as determined in chapter 34.

Veterans eligible for educational benefits under title 38, chapter 34 are those veterans who served more than 180 days of active duty between January 31, 1955, and January 1, 1977, and who were discharged under conditions other than dishonorable.

The educational benefits provided to these veterans in section 1662 extend up to 10 years after discharge. To many veterans who served in active duty during the Vietnam era, 10 years is a relatively short period of time in the process of becoming readjusted to civilian life. At the end of 10 years, many veterans have just begun to take advantage of the educational opportunities that their benefits provide. It is my belief that an additional 5 years is needed in most cases to complete educational programs.

For this reason my bill strikes out "10 year(s)" and inserts "15 year(s)" in section 1662 of title 38. In order to give this 5-year extention of benefits to all Vietnam-era veterans, my bill also extends to December 31, 1989, education benefits for all veterans covered by chapter 34 whose educational benefits expire prior to the passage of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, these veterans served our country during an era when it was not popular to do so. The conditions in Vietnam were in many instances incomprehensible to the point of being barbaric. These veterans deserve every benefit that their service to this country provides for them. I invite my colleagues to join me in reaffirming our commitment to America's veterans. This is an opportunity for us to say once again that, "we have not forgotten."●

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, February 2, in my congressional district, a ceremony will be held marking the official opening of the Capitol Heights Medical Center in a neighborhood that has not had immediate access to good medical care. One of the driving forces behind the opening of the medical center is Dr. Francis Paul Chiaramonte, who is also the founder of the Southern Maryland Hospital Center. Responding to a request from the town manager and town officials of Capitol Heights, Dr. Chiaramonte has established a modern, well-equipped clinic that will serve the community with access to medical specialists at the lowest possible rates. The clinic will succeed, I am confident, as have Dr. Chiaramonte's many other endeavors over the years on behalf of the people of Southern Maryland.

Dr. Chiaramonte was born and raised in Shelter Island, NY. At the age of 17 he entered Colgate University, from which he received his degree in just 3½ years. Following his graduation, during the Korean conflict, he was granted a direct commission in the U.S. Air Force as a career officer. During his service in the Air Force he served as an assistant hospital administrator and was also in charge of the Air Base Department of Environmental Health, Communicable Disease Control and Health Education.

After his Air Force service, Francis Chiaramonte studied at Georgetown University School of Medicine, from which he received his medical degree. He also received a masters degree in public health from the Columbia University School of Public Health and Administrative Medicine.

Dr. Chiaramonte's internship was spent as a commissioned officer of the U.S. Public Health Service and he completed the 4-year residency in the specialty of urology at Georgetown University and affiliated health programs.

During these years, Dr. Chiaramonte moved his rapidly growing family to Southern Maryland., Following his training, he became the first full-time urologist in Prince George's County.

As his practice progressed, it became evident to Dr. Chiaramonte that there was a need in our area for greater access to medical specialists. He became interested in opening a hospital to meet the medical needs of the people of Southern Maryland. In response to these needs, after many years of hard work, Dr. Chiaramonte established Southern Maryland Hospital Center in Clinton, south of the Beltway on Route 5.

Dr. Chiaramonte has developed a major hospital with full services for a community which previously had been underserved.

The hospital is also an important part of the community in providing health screening and health education services.

A fellow of the American College of Surgeons since 1968, Dr. Chiaramonte was inducted into the International College of Surgeons in 1982. Both the doctor and the hospital have received many accolades and awards: full accreditation on its initial expansion from the Joint Committee on the Accreditation of Hospitals; the "Barrier Free" Award for barrier-free design was presented to the hospital by the Governor's Committee for the Handicapped; and the doctor received the Professional Award from the Prince Georges Chamber of Commerce for Business-Community Service, the Citizen of the Year Award from the John F. Kennedy Council, Knights of Columbus, and the Citizen of the Year Award from the Prince Georges County Board of Trade. Dr. Chiaramonte was also the recipient of the Metropolitan Washington Executive of the Year Award from the Sales and Marketing Executives of Metropolitan Washington.

Recently appointed to the advisory council of the Johns Hopkins University School of Arts and Sciences, Dr. Chiaramonte is a member of the honorary board of directors of the Children to Children Foundation and a member of the Citizens Advisory Committee of Prince Georges Community College.

In addition to his involvement with the hospital and his extensive civic and educational activities, Dr. Chiaramonte continues to practice urology extensively.

With the opening of the Capital Heights Medical Center, Dr. Chairamonte complements his goal of providing improved health care services for the people of southern Maryland. For that we all thank him.●

LET'S SEND THE FmHA LOANS IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill today that both restores the Farmers Home Administration to its rightful role as a family farm lender and targets scarce farm program resources to those who need it most.

Historically, the Farmers Home Administration has been a lender of last resort for farmers. Their basic loan programs are targeted to beginning and low-equity farmers to buy land and operate their farms.

However, Congress erred, I believe, when it added the Disaster Emergency Loan Program to FmHA's jurisdiction. These loans are available to any size farm, in amounts up to $500,000—far beyond the limits needed by most family-sized farms struck by a natural disaster.

This program has been in the news over the past year because John W. Curry, who owns over 35 farms in Iowa, Missouri, and Minnesota, and who is a long-time farming business partner of Agriculture Secretary John Block, received a disaster emergency loan for $400,000. Earlier this month, Mr. Curry defaulted on that loan.

There is something fundamentally wrong here. Disaster emergency loans to farms of unlimited size go against the grain of the whole thrust of the Farmers Home Administration. While FmHA was doling out disaster emergency funds in $400,000 chunks, beginning farmers were not able to get other FmHA loans because demand far exceeded money available.

My bill deals with this problem in a straightforward way. It simply restricts the Disaster Emergency Loan Program to family farms, as is required in FmHA ownership and operating loans. I believe it is a simple, yet effective, step which puts FmHA back on the right track in helping family farmers.●

TRIBUTE TO BOB COCHRAN

HON. GEORGE (BUDDY) DARDEN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, this past Thanksgiving, Bob Cochran a much respected newspaperman, who also worked at various times for two former Members of the House, passed away in Cabin John, MD.

Bob Cochran was a familiar figure here on Capitol Hill and his writings, reproduced in many publications, appeared nationwide. One of Bob's many friends, John L. Perry, editor of the Rome News Tribune, wrote a very touching tribute to Bob, recounting his many accomplishments and saying, in a very special way, how much Bob is missed by those who knew him. Because I know that many of those who knew Bob may not have had the opportunity to read John Perry's article, I am asking that it be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I know that you will find it to be a truthful and fitting tribute to Bob Cochran.

OF ALL HE DID SO WELL, HE DID FRIENDSHIP BEST

If the world seems slightly shrunken and a little off its axis it's because Bob Cochran died this Thanksgiving.

As word went out from Washington among his network of friends around America, it was greeted almost universally by two short words—the same expletive evoked by a receiver who drops the football on the one-yard line after catching a sure-touchdown pass.

He was unknown in most communities, but what he stood for and how he did it had to have made them all, including this one, the better.

Although he had lived in Texas, Brazil and Virginia, he belonged to the nation's capital, where he settled and raised his family in the Maryland suburbs close by the Potomac River. He died in the little community of Cabin John, just up from Glen Echo.

Trained in the law, Cochran found its restraints too confining for his soaring mind. The avenue of the written word became the appropriate outlet for his insatiable intellect.

He could send words marching like Coldstream Guardsmen across the page. His sentences might drift in like exquisite, discrete snowflakes falling upon an indigo blanket. Or, his thoughts would roar like an icy waterfall cascading down the Blue Ridge.

It was near-impossible to edit him. When he chose, he could entwine one word with the next, one idea to another—in the trade it's known as knitting and purling—so intricately that to disturb one would cause all others to come tumbling like so many jackstraws.

His addiction to history led hm into biographical writing, and he numbered among his subjects and acquaintances presidents and cooks, soldiers and Supreme Court justices, senators and financiers, philosophers and weavers, lobbyists and guitarists.

His words were reproduced in New Yorker, the Washington Post, Smithsonian magazine and numerous journals. He once edited the editorial page of the Houston Chronicle and a weekly in Leesburg, Virginia. He had been on the editorial staff of the National Geographic Magazine and in the employ of Arthur Godfrey.

Government lured him temporarily. He ran the Small Business Administration for its nominal head. During President Lyndon B. Johnson's campaign against Barry Goldwater, he was on the White House speechwriting team. For a while, he produced the newsletter that kept local and state officials informed on federal disaster-assistance programs.

But, his was a free spirit, and the fetters of bureaucracy chaffed.

Next to writing, he loved American government. No one revered so much as he the very halls of the democracy, and he watched down the years the parade of political pygmies and titans, measuring each with the historian's harsh eye. He insisted on holding them all to the standards of the founders. Had he lived a couple of centuries earlier, his name would have been among those at the bottom of the Declaration of Independence.

He found charity in his heart for all who occupied the Oval Office—all, that is, save Richard Nixon. Cochran had his number from the outset, and when Watergate finally broke and the dirty water of deceit and arrogance gushed forth for all to see, Cochran raised a toast to the Republic, which he believed all along would somehow save itself, like a well-hewn ship righting in a desperate storm.

Cochran took the occasion also to pay his respects to Nixon, in memorable language deserving enshrinement in the National Archives. Shunning barnyard blasphemy, he was a creative cusser, ever apt and original. Harry Truman, among his heroes, would approve.

Nowhere around Washington was political conversation better than at Cochran's. He was one of the dwindling few unreconstructed Adlai Stevensonians.

A gourmet cook, he understood—as few cooks do, which is why there are so few good cooks—that cooking is but the incidental final touch on a meal, which begins with the shopping and is part of a long continuum. He did it all, from menu-planning to cooking, carving to serving. No one enobles a pork roast as Cochran could.

The Cochran's table was always full—children, grandchildren, friends. Their bank account was often low—life in the Cochran household being a number of harrowing escapes from creditors—but, as if by divine intent, the table was always laden.

Bodily nourishment was not all they served: The table was where the Cochrans passed on the heritage, adjudicated disputes, defined justice, set standards.

His was a marvelous sense of humor, which, mixed with honest outrage, was Cochran's way of living in a world overloaded by fools and knaves. He found no need for forgiveness. Those he loved were covered by it so completely there was nothing left to forgive.

Cochran made acquaintances easily; friends, warily. Once admitted to that honest embrace, one was never allowed to leave.

No matter how bad things got, a friend could turn to Cochran for unsentimental solace. His was the kind of friendship that permitted long absences or silences, which, when broken, found the friendship intact as ever. He had a sixth sense of when to write or phone, just when his reassurance was needed most.

Something hit him about 20 years ago—a stroke or some neurological malady that zapped a piece of his fertile brain, but not the thinking part. It left him with a slightly gimpy leg and arm and a Chaplinesque shamble. It demanded a cane, so Cochran adopted—with elan—one with a gold head.

He was a tailored man, and with his imposing stick and bowler hat—he wrote also about hats—Cochran cut a figure that enabled him to enter any office unquestioned.

He was in love all his life, and America was his mistress. He loved her so much he wept at her slightest shortcoming.

Just before the end, he was asked to take on some special, silent assignments for his country. He did, with distinction.

This is a safer, more-decent land for his having walked it.

He did more than one man's share of maintaining the integrity of the language, leaving it richer before he had to lay it down.

He was an historian, a chef. A writer, a conversationalist. An editor, a political scientist. A humorists, a patriot.

Best of all, a friend.●

NATIONAL ORGAN DONATION AWARENESS WEEK

HON. SID MORRISON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, today I have the privilege to introduce a joint resolution to authorize and request the President of the United States to issue a proclamation designating April 21 through 27, 1985, as "National Organ Donation Awareness Week."

Mr. Speaker, I could tell you that this year alone it is estimated that 100,000 Americans could benefit from an organ transplant, and that many won't, because donors just aren't available. And, I could tell you that some of these folks in need will die this year, not because suitable donors don't exist, but because suitable donors have not pledged this lifesaving gift.

Instead, I would like to focus on one man who now has a chance to live his entire life, fully. He's not anybody famous. He's not anybody in the news. His name is James Merrill Johnson and he lives in Kennewick, WA, with his wife and small children. Merrill, as his friends call him, received a kidney this past September from someone who didn't even know him, a somebody, though, who obviously must have cared a lot that someone else wasn't cheated out of a few more precious years of life.

Because of this gift of time, Merrill can continue to do the things that are important to him, like helping his wife raise their kids and maybe teaching them to fish when they get old enough; and volunteering at his church, where he works with children. He says this is his calling.

Now I think this donor must be a great person, but you know, I'm sure that there are many other equally generous folks out there who just haven't pledged. And, I figure that the only reason they haven't done so is because they either don't know they can, or don't know how easy it is, to make this beautiful lifesaving gift.

And this is why, Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues in both Houses to join me in making this resolution for "National Organ Donation Awareness Week." The need to tell people about organ donation is clear. Until there are enough donors to meet the need, for all the Mr. Johnsons who get this chance to live out their entire lives, there will be countless others who won't. And the contributions that these less fortunate persons could have made in the balance of the lives they were cheated out of, will be lost to us, forever.●

HUNTERS' PROTECTION ACT OF 1985

HON. RON MARLENEE

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to your attention and the attention of my colleagues a bill which I am today introducing called the Hunters' Protection Act of 1985. A bill which will protect the civil rights of all sportsmen.

The Hunter Protection Act will establish penalties for individuals who seek to disrupt lawful hunts. This bill will protect sportsmen from the hunting/sabotage activities of antihunting groups. These groups have published pamphlets on methods of disrupting hunts and have ruined sanctioned, lawful hunts in many parts of the country.

The sportsmen of America have rights and I intend to fight to protect those rights and I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort by cosponsoring this bill.●

NATIONAL CHILD ABUSE PREVENTION MONTH

HON. JOHN HILER

OF INDIANA

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. HILER. Mr. Speaker, it has been my pleasure to introduce in the 97th, 98th, and 99th Congresses commemorative legislation designed to assist our Nation's children by increasing the awareness of a very serious national problem—child abuse. It is estimated that more than 5,000 children were killed by their parents or parent-surrogates last year. An estimated 2 million children experience some form of child abuse every year. These statistics are tragic and growing.

Again this year, my colleague Mary Rose Oakar and I are bringing this intolerable situation to the attention of Congress in an effort to alert Americans to the problem and to make them aware of the remedies available through largely volunteer organizations, such as Parents Anonymous and the National Committee for the Prevention of Child Abuse. Because of the tremendous success in many parts of the Nation resulting from this legislation over the last few years, I urge my colleagues to support, once more, a resolution designating April as national child abuse prevention month.

The other body will soon be considering such legislation. Let us continue a tradition of support for national child abuse prevention month and help curb this national tragedy.●

A TRIBUTE TO A TRUE PATRIOT

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today, I rise in commemorating the 132d anniversary of Jose Marti's birth on January 28th. Jose Marti was a great Cuban patriot who fought to bring freedom to his nation and died for his cause.

He dedicated his life to ending colonial rule in Cuba and preventing the island from developing a government inimical to the principles of democracy. At the young age of 17, he was exiled to Spain for opposing colonial rule. Marti returned to Cuba in 1895 to lead the Cuban War for Independence in which he was killed during one of the battles.

From the early years of his youth to his death in the struggle to free the Cuban people, Jose Marti was devoted to bringing liberty and morality to his beloved Cuba. It is for this great man that the United States named the new radio program to Cuba which broadcasts the truth to the Cuban people.

If Jose Marti were alive today, he would surely condemn the repressive and totalitarian Castro government and fight to bring freedom to Cuba. He was a true democratic theorist who stressed individual freedom and human rights in his writings.

I join the Cuban-American community and city of Miami in saluting this major democratic patriot.●

SELF-DETERMINATION FOR PUERTO RICO

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, today, I offer a bill to provide self-determination for Puerto Rico.

Puerto Rico was taken in war and has been held without a true determination of the will of the Puerto Rican people.

Our Declaration of Independence holds a guarantee to all people of the inalienable right to self-determination. There is no power in the Constitution for the United States to hold people in a subordinate, colonial status.

I am not seeking to decide a particular status for Puerto Rico, but, rather to establish a just procedure for allowing the Puerto Rican people, free from outside pressure, intimidation or harassment, to decide their own status.

These are the proposals of the resolution:

First, we establish as policy two points. One, that it is the sovereign right of the people of Puerto Rico to freely decide their status without intervention whatsoever of any outside government and/or foreign force. Two, the process of self-determination shall comply with the requirements of the United Nations.

We mandate that all powers and authority presently exercised by the three branches of the Government of the United States over Puerto Rico shall be relinquished and transferred to the people of Puerto Rico.

The President will announce the withdrawal and surrender of all rights of possession, supervision, jurisdiction, and control of sovereignty then existing, including the military.

The Puerto Rican people will then establish an organizing committee, with equal representation from all political parties. This organizing committee will carry out the election of a constituent assembly with proportional representation of political parties and states.

The constituent assembly shall assume the powers over Puerto Rico from the U.S. Government and the powers outlined by the Constitution of the Commonwealth.

A negotiating commission of the United States and Puerto Rican Governments is created to negotiate on terms of relations including citizenship, property rights, and other questions in the event Puerto Rico decides to be independent, and all terms of relationships in the event Puerto Rico proposes some form of free association.

The resolution establishes a transition mechanism to hold U.S. funds due to Puerto Rico while the decision of status is being made. It ensures that the people of Puerto Rico will receive the rights and benefits acknowledged under U.S. law by virtue of their status as veterans or beneficiaries of pensions.

What is created is a means whereby Puerto Ricans can determine their status free from U.S. pressures and free from the fear of losing owed benefits. Further, Puerto Rico and the United States can approach each other in appropriate discussions as equals.

In other words, self-determination.●

ASSISTANCE TO WELFARE RECIPIENTS

HON. NANCY L. JOHNSON

OF CONNECTICUT

Thursday, January 31, 1985

● Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, today, with my colleagues BARBARA KENNELLY and OLYMPIA SNOWE, I am proud to reintroduce legislation that I originally submitted last August. This bill provides welfare recipients with young children access to the education and training they so desperately need to break the cycle of welfare dependence.

Welfare reform is an issue of concern for everyone. It touches the recipient, the taxpayer, and even the Social Security beneficiary. In 1950, the wages of 17 workers contributed to the benefits of each Social Security retiree. By the year 2000, the checks will reflect the contribution of only three workers. With this dramatic shift in the ratio of retirees to workers, we can't afford to ignore that the quality of life for future seniors depends to a great extent on the job readiness of today's children.

Yet, one in five children born in this country are the children of single parents, and of these, 50 percent are born to teenage mothers. In addition, 70 percent of women on welfare don't have a high school diploma. We can't expect these mothers or their children to realize economic security for themselves now or in the future.

The long-term benefits of this proposal would far exceed its short-term costs. It establishes a limited demonstration program, with 10 pilot projects, and coordinates existing programs, services, and facilities that taken individually, are not accessible nor geared to the needs of a welfare parent.

The pilot project would offer 20 hours a week of education and training to single AFDC parents, with emphasis on assisting the participant to attain her high school diploma. The bill promotes the use of facilities that are already available in the community to minimize the cost of the program, such as classroom space and school buses—for instruction, onsite day care, and transportation.

A voluntary advisory group, composed of local educators, members of the business community, family service professionals, and the recipients themselves, would design the projects. Before beginning training, the participant would be required to help plan, approve, and sign her program, so she develops a sense of responsibility for her career development.

Finally, support services are provided on an income-related basis following completion of the program so that the new graduate is not forced to return to the welfare rolls when she finds that she can't afford child care or health care.

Our support for the social and economic well-being of all persons is based on the understanding that unskilled women cannot achieve self-reliance without education and vocational training. We must recognize, however, that the single head of household cannot take advantage of education and training unless child care is available, too.

Welfare reform is crucial to our future competitiveness in an increasingly global economy, to preserve the quality of life we have developed for older Americans, and to create the opportunity this country has always symbolized. It is imperative that we create new solutions to old problems, and we can do this by better organizing and integrating the resources we now possess. I hope you will agree and support this legislation.●

(Legislative day of Monday, January 21, 1985)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

Mr. WYLIE of Ohio;
Mrs. HOLT of Maryland;
Mr. LUNGREN of California; and
Ms. SNOWE of Maine.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, DC,
February 4, 1985.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to the permission granted in Clause 5, Rule III of the Rules of the U.S. House of Representatives, I have the honor to transmit a sealed envelope received from the White House at 5:55 p.m. on Friday, February 1, 1985 and said to contain a message to the Congress transmitting the President's unclassified Report on Soviet Noncompliance with Arms Control Agreements as required by the FY-1985 Defense Authorization Act.

With kind regards, I am,
Sincerely,

BENJAMIN J. GUTHRIE,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

REPORT ON ARMS CONTROL COMPLIANCE—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Armed Services:

To the Congress of the United States:

During 1984, at the request of the Congress, I forwarded two reports to the Congress on arms control compliance. The first, forwarded last January, was an in-depth analysis of seven specific issues of violations or probable violations by the Soviet Union of arms control obligations and commitments. The second report, forwarded in October, was an advisory study prepared independently by the General Advisory Committee on Arms Control and Disarmament. These reports indicate that there is cause for serious concern regarding the Soviet Union's conduct with respect to observance of arms control agreements.

In the FY-1985 Defense Authorization Act and the Conference Report on that Act, the Congress called for additional classified and unclassified reports regarding a wide range of questions concerning the Soviet Union's compliance with arms control commitments. The Administration is responding to these requests by providing both classified and unclassified reports which update the seven issues initially analyzed in the January 1984 report, and analyze a number of additional issues.

In this unclassified report the United States Government reaffirms the conclusions of its January 1984 report that the USSR has violated the Helsinki Final Act, the Geneva Protocol on Chemical Weapons, the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention, and two provisions of SALT II: telemetry encryption and ICBM modernization. The United States Government also reaffirms its previous conclusions that the USSR has probably violated the SS-16 deployment prohibition of SALT II and is likely to have violated the nuclear testing yield limit of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty. In addition, the United States Government has determined that the USSR has violated the ABM Treaty (through the siting, orientation and capability of the Krasnoyarsk Radar), violated the Limited Test Ban Treaty, and violated the SALT II provision prohibiting more than one new type of ICBM, and probably violated the ABM Treaty restriction on concurrent testing of SAM and ABM components. Evidence regarding the USSR's compliance with the ABM Treaty provision on component mobility was determined to be ambiguous. In addition, the United States Government is concerned about Soviet preparations for a prohibited territorial ABM defense. Further, the USSR was determined to be currently in compliance with those provisions of the SALT I Interim Agreement and its implementing procedures that deal with reuse of dismantled ICBM sites and with the reconfiguration of dismantled ballistic missile launching submarines.

Beyond the issues that are treated in the unclassified report released today, there are other compliance issues that will not be publicly disclosed at this time but which remain under review. As we continue to work on these issues, we will brief and consult with the Congress in detail and will, to the maximum extent possible, keep the public informed on our findings.

In order for arms control to have meaning and credibly contribute to national security and to global or regional stability, it is essential that all parties to agreements fully comply with them. Strict compliance with all provisions of arms control agreements is fundamental, and this Administration will not accept anything less. To do so would undermine the arms control process and damage the chances for establishing a more constructive US-Soviet relationship.

As I stated last January, Soviet noncompliance is a serious matter. It calls into question important security benefits from arms control, and could create new security risks. It undermines the confidence essential to an effective arms control process in the future. With regard to the issues analyzed in the January 1984 report, the Soviet Union has thus far not provided satisfactory explanations nor undertaken corrective actions sufficient to alleviate our concerns. The United States Government has vigorously pressed, and will continue to press, these compliance issues with the Soviet Union through diplomatic channels.

Our approach in pursuing these issues with the Soviet Union is to ensure that both the letter and intent of treaty obligations and commitments will be fulfilled. To this end the Administration is: analyzing further issues of possible noncompliance; as noted above, seeking from the Soviet Union through diplomatic channels explanations, clarifications, and, where necessary, corrective actions; reporting on such issues to the Congress; and taking into account in our defense modernization plans the security implications of arms control violations. At the same time, the United States is continuing to carry out its own obligations and commitments under relevant agreements. Our objectives in the new negotiations which begin in March are to reverse the erosion of the ABM Treaty and to seek equitable, effectively verifiable arms control agreements which will result in real reductions and enhance stability. While all of these steps can help, however, it is fundamentally important that the Soviet Union take a constructive attitude toward full compliance with all arms control obligations and commitments.

The Administration and the Congress have a shared interest in supporting the arms control process. For this reason, increased understanding of Soviet violations or probable violations, and a strong Congressional consensus on the importance of compliance to achieving effective arms control, will strengthen our efforts both in the new negotiations and in seeking corrective actions from the Soviet Union.

I look forward to continued close consultation with the Congress as we seek to make progress in resolving compliance issues and in negotiating sound arms control agreements.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 1, 1985.

THE BUDGET OF THE U.S. GOVERNMENT, 1986—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 99-17)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In the past 2 years we have experienced one of the strongest economic recoveries of the post-war period. The prospect of a substantially brighter future for America lies before us. As 1985 begins, the economy is growing robustly and shows considerable upward momentum. Favorable financial conditions presage a continuation of the expansion. Production, productivity, and employment gains have been impressive, and inflation remains well under control. I am proud of the state of our economy. Let me highlight a few points:

—The economy expanded at a 6.8% rate in 1984 and at a 6% annual rate over the 2 years since the recession trough at the end of 1982—faster than any other upturn since 1951.

—Confidence in the economy has prompted business firms to expand their capital facilities. Real investment in new plant and equipment has grown 15.4% annually since the end of 1982—faster than in any other post-war recovery.

—The ratio of real investment to real GNP has reached its highest level in the post-war period.

—Industrial production is 23% above its level at the recession trough in November 1982—a greater advance than in any other recovery since 1958.

—Corporate profits have risen nearly 90% since the recession trough in 1982—the fastest 8-quarter increase in 37 years.

—Civilian employment has grown 7.2 million over the past 25 months and the number of unemployed has fallen by 3.7 million. In the last 4 months alone, more than 1.1 million Americans have found jobs.

—Inflation remains well under control. The December 1984 CPI was 4% higher than a year earlier, about a third of the rate of inflation this administration inherited. The GNP deflator, the broadest measure of inflation, increased only 3.5% last year and at only a 2.4% annual rate in the fourth quarter.

—The prime rate of interest is now only half of what it was when I took office.

Contrast our current circumstances with the situation we faced just 4 years ago. Inflation was raging at double-digit rates. Oil prices had soared. The prime rate of interest was over 20%. The economy was stagnating. Unemployment had risen sharply and was to rise further. America's standing in world opinion was at low ebb.

All that, mercifully, is behind us now. The tremendous turnaround in our fortunes did not just happen. In February 1981, I presented the four fundamentals of my economic program. They were:

—Reducing the growth of overall Federal spending by eliminating activities that are beyond the proper sphere of Federal Government responsibilities and by restraining the growth of spending for other activities.

—Limiting tax burdens to the minimum levels necessary to finance only essential government services, thereby strengthening incentives for saving, investment, work, productivity, and economic growth.

—Reducing the Federal regulatory burden where the Federal Government intrudes unnecessarily into our private lives, the efficient conduct of private business, or the operations of State and local governments.

—Supporting a sound and steady monetary policy, to encourage economic growth and bring inflation under control.

FOUR YEARS OF ACCOMPLISHMENT

These policies were designed to restore economic growth and stability. They succeeded.

The past 4 years have also seen the beginning of a quiet but profound revolution in the conduct of our Federal Government. We have halted what seemed at the time an inexorable set of trends toward greater and greater Government intrusiveness, more and more regulation, higher and higher taxes, more and more spending, higher and higher inflation, and weaker and weaker defense. We have halted these trends in our first 4 years.

—The rate of Federal spending growth was out of control at 17.4% a year in 1980. Under my budget proposals the growth of programmatic spending—that is, total Federal spending except for debt service—will be zero next year—frozen at this year's levels.

—Further, spending will grow only 30% over the 4 years from 1982 to 1986, compared to its record pace of 66% between 1977 and 1981, and this despite legislated additions to my program and the needed rebuilding of our defense capabilities.

—The Federal tax system was changed for the better—marginal tax rates were reduced and depreciation reform introduced. These reforms were designed to increase incentives for work, training and education, saving, business growth, and capital expansion. Tax loopholes have been closed, improving the equity of the system.

—Domestic spending, which previously grew faster than any other major part of the budget (nearly fourfold in real terms between 1960 and 1980), will have been virtually frozen from 1981 to 1985.

—Our defense capabilities are now getting back to a level where we can protect our citizens, honor our commitments to our allies, and participate in the long-awaited arms control talks from a position of respected strength.

—Federal credit programs, which had also grown out of control, have been cut back, and their management has been vastly improved.

—The rapid growth of regulations and red tape has also been halted. The number of Federal rules published by agencies has fallen by over 35% during the past 4 years, and many unnecessary old rules have been eliminated. For the first time, the Federal Register of new regulatory actions has grown shorter for 4 consecutive years; it is now 41% shorter than it was in 1980.

—Major management improvement initiatives are underway that will fundamentally change the way the Federal Government operates. The President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control has completed its report, and many of its recommendations are included in this budget. The President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency has reported $46 billion in improved use of funds through reduction of waste and fraud.

—The Federal nondefense work force has been reduced by over 78,000.

The proposals contained in this budget will build on the accomplishments of the last 4 years and put into action a philosophy of government that is working and that has received the overwhelming endorsement of the American people.

THE 1986 BUDGET PROGRAM

If we took no action to curb the growth of spending, Federal outlays would rise to over a trillion dollars in 1986. This would result in deficits exceeding $200 billion in each of the next 5 years. This is unacceptable. The budget I propose, therefore, will reduce spending by $51 billion in 1986, $83 billion in 1987, and $105 billion in 1988. Enactment of these measures would reduce the deficit projected for 1988 to $144 billion—still a far cry from our goal of a balanced budget, but a significant step in the right direction and a 42% reduction from the current services level projected for that year.

Last year my administration worked with Congress to come up with a downpayment on reducing the deficit. This budget commits the Government to a second installment. With comparable commitments to further reductions in the next two budgets, and, I hope, other spending reduction ideas advanced by the Congress, we can achieve our goal in an orderly fashion.

The budget proposes a 1-year freeze in total spending other than debt service. This will be achieved through a combination of freezes, reforms, terminations, cutbacks, and management improvements in individual programs. For a number of reasons, a line-by-line budget freeze is not possible or desirable. Further, such an approach would assume that all programs are of equal importance. Taken together, the specific proposals in this budget hold total Federal spending excluding debt service constant in 1986 at its 1985 level.

The budget proposals provide for substantial cost savings in the medicare program, in Federal payroll costs, in agricultural and other subsidies to business and upper-income groups, in numerous programs providing grants to State and local governments, and in credit programs. A freeze is proposed in the level of some entitlement program benefits, other than social security, means-tested programs, and programs for the disabled, that have hitherto received automatic "cost-of-living adjustments" every year. The budget proposes further reductions in defense spending below previously reduced mid-year levels.

Despite the reforms of the past 4 years, our Federal tax system remains complex and inequitable. Tax rates are still so high that they distort economic decisions, and this reduces economic growth from what it otherwise could be. I will propose, after further consultation with the Congress, further tax simplification and reform. The proposals will not be a scheme to raise taxes—only to distribute their burden more fairly and to simplify the entire system. By broadening the base, we can lower rates.

THE BUDGET TOTALS

	1984 actual	1985 estimate	1986 estimate	1987 estimate	1988 estimate
Receipt	666.5	736.9	793.7	861.7	950.4
Outlays	851.8	959.1	973.7	1,026.6	1,094.8
Deficit (—)	—185.3	—222.2	—180.0	—164.9	—144.4

Note: Totals include outlays that are off-budget under current law, proposed to be included on-budget.

There will be substantial political resistance to every deficit reduction measure proposed in this budget. Every dollar of current Federal spending benefits someone, and that person has a vested self-interest in seeing these benefits perpetuated and expanded. Prior to my administration, such interests had been dominant and their expectation and demands had been met, time and time again.

Freeze on programmatic outlays

	Billions
Fiscal year 1985 estimate:
Programmatic outlays	$804
Debt service	959
Fiscal year 1986 estimate:
Programmatic outlays	804
Debt service	974

At some point, however, the question must be raised: "Where is the political logrolling going to stop?" At some point, the collective demands upon the public Treasury of all the special interests combined exceed the public's ability and willingness to pay. The single most difficult word for a politician to utter is a simple, flat "No." The patience of the American people has been stretched as far as it will go. They want action; they have demanded it.

We said "no" frequently in 1981, and real spending for discretionary domestic programs dropped sharply. But we did not accomplish enough. We now have no choice but to renew our efforts with redoubled vigor. The profusion of Federal domestic spending programs must be reduced to an acceptable, appropriate, and supportable size.

It will require political courage of a high order to carry this program forward in the halls of Congress, but I believe that with good faith and goodwill on all sides, we can succeed. If we fail to reduce excessive Federal benefits to special interest groups, we will be saddled either with larger budget deficits or with higher taxes—either of which would be of greater harm to the American economy and people.

1986 MANAGEMENT AND REGULATORY PROGRAM

Not only must both the scope and scale of Federal spending be drastically cut back to reduce the deficit: we must also institute comprehensive management improvements and administrative reforms to make sure that we use available funds as efficiently as possible.

Tough but necessary steps are being taken throughout the Federal Government to reduce the costs of management and administration. Substantial savings in overhead costs have been achieved under provisions of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984. A 5% Federal civilian employee salary cut has been proposed; a 10% reduction in administrative overhead has been ordered; termination of programs that have outlived their usefulness is proposed; outmoded, inefficient agency field structures that have evolved over the past half-century are being consolidated and streamlined to take advantage of efficiencies made possible by modern transportation, communication, and information technology.

Administration of Federal agencies is being made more efficient through the adoption of staffing standards, automation of manual processes, consolidation of similar functions, and reduction of administrative overhead costs. A program to increase productivity by 20% by 1992 in all appropriate Government functions is being instituted, as are improved cash and credit management systems and error rate reduction programs.

This management improvement program will result in a leaner and more efficient Federal structure and will be described in a management report that I am submitting to the Congress for the first time shortly after my annual budget submission.

We have also made a great deal of progress in reducing the costs imposed on businesses and State and local governments by Federal regulations. These savings are estimated to total $150 billion over a 10-year period. We have reduced the number of new regulations in every year of my first term and have eliminated or reduced paperwork requirements by over 300 million hours each year. In addition, the regulations are more carefully crafted to achieve the greatest protection for the least cost, and wherever possible to use market forces instead of working against them.

A recent Executive Order will strengthen the executive branch coordination that has made these accomplishments possible. For the first time, we will publish an annual program of the most significant regulatory activities, including those that precede the publication of a proposed rule. This will give Congress and the public an earlier opportunity to understand the administration's regulatory policies and priorities.

CONCLUSION

The key elements of the program I set out 4 years ago are in place and working well. Our national security is being restored; so, I am happy to report, is our economy. Growth and investment are healthy; and inflation, interest rates, tax rates, and unemployment are down and can be reduced further. The proliferation of unnecessary regulations that stifled both economic growth and our individual freedoms has been halted. Progress has been made toward the reduction of unwarranted and excessive growth in domestic spending programs.

But we cannot rest on these accomplishments. If we are to attain a new era of sustained peace, prosperity, growth, and freedom, Federal domestic spending must be brought firmly under control. This budget presents the steps that I believe must be taken. I do not exclude other economies that Congress may devise, so long as they do not imperil my fundamental constitutional responsibilities to look after the national defense and the general welfare of the American people.

Let us get on with the job. The time for action is now.

RONALD REAGAN.

NO TO DEFENSE DEPARTMENT SPENDING INCREASES

(Mr. HUBBARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, today President Reagan has sent Congress a $973.7 billion budget for fiscal year 1986. We've just heard the President's message.

President Reagan proposes a military budget of $277.5 billion for next fiscal year, about 13 percent more than the Defense Department will spend this year.

Yes—the administration budget would push military spending higher than ever.

Congress has approved more than 96 percent of the Reagan administration's defense budget requests.

During my 10 years in Congress I have supported almost all defense budget requests.

I represent Fort Campbell, KY, and hundreds of my constituents work at Fort Knox, KY.

I've served in the Air Force and the Army.

I continue to support a strong national defense for many reasons.

But, let's be serious. Our No. 1 problem today is this massive national debt and continued deficit spending.

If Congress is to make meaningful and significant spending reductions during this year, there must be cuts both in domestic and military spending.

My constituents in Kentucky, 92 percent registered as Democrats but who gave President Reagan a big majority last November 6, want big reductions in Federal spending.

I would remind President Reagan that one reason for his landslide victory on November 6 was that Americans believed he would reduce Federal spending more quickly and more substantially than his opponent.

Most of the people I represent in Kentucky are more scared in 1985 of the words "continued deficit spending will ultimately destroy us" than they are the words "the Russians are coming."

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY BILLION GALLONS OF RED INK

(Mrs. SCHROEDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, today the country was engulfed by a torrent of red ink—Ronald Reagan's fiscal year 1986 Federal budget.

Yet all the newspapers report it as if it were actually a budget.

I do believe that if the White House announced that President Reagan was a giraffe, the next morning's papers would all have headlines, "Reagan a Giraffe, White House Discloses."

The headlines would be followed by studious analysis on how the giraffe disclosure would affect municipal bond rates, Japanese auto imports, and the 1986 elections. Republican congressional leaders would note the Reagan was a fine-looking giraffe, in good condition for his age.

Democrats would complain that he spends too much time ruminating in California. Environmentalists would criticize him for chewing leaves off trees.

Meanwhile, somewhere out in the country someone, most likely a child, would say, "But Reagan's not a giraffe."

Well, this is not a budget, it's a crimson niagara. It calls for 180 billion gallons of red ink in fiscal year 1986 and over 400 billion gallons in the 3 years thereafter.

If you don't believe me, just paddle over to the OMB. David Stockman is hard at work building an ark.

FIDEL CASTRO AND A CHANGING CUBA

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to announce that I have taken a special order following regular business today for the purpose of responding to the President's budget, and invite all Democratic Members to join in that initiative.

Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, I would point out to Members who were traveling to their districts over the weekend that the lead story in the Washington Post on Sunday reported extensively about the Republic of Cuba and President Fidel Castro's apparent desire to seek a more moderate, more conciliatory road to change in Latin America. These news articles in large measure reflect my own personal impressions of Castro and of the changing conditions in Cuba following a recent trip to the island nation in January during which the delegation spent 3 days with Castro. I counted 37.5 hours of direct discussion on policy issues.

While certainly all dealings with foreign heads of state by our United States and representatives of our nations should be approached with caution, still we must leave no stone unturned in our quest for peace.

I would like, therefore, to invite all Members from both sides of the aisle to attend a briefing session that I and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JIM LEACH] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MICKEY LELAND] will be giving to the members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee this Wednesday at 2 p.m. in the regular meeting room.

Also, I submit a summary of my impressions for printing in the RECORD:

JANUARY 30, 1985.

Memorandum to: Members of the House of Representatives.

From: Bill Alexander, Chief Deputy Majority Whip.

In re: Trip to the Republic of Cuba January 10-17, 1985.

IMPORTANT NOTE

As a preface for this report, it is stated that at no time did I or any other member of the Congressional Delegation attempt to negotiate for the United States government with the Cuban government. The Cubans were aware of our position on this point since we explicitly and specifically advised them we were not serving in the role of negotiators.

MEMBERSHIP OF THE BIPARTISAN CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION

The Congressional Delegation was composed of Congressman Bill Alexander, Chief Deputy Majority Whip of the House; Congressman Jim Leach, Ranking Minority Member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations and of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, Subcommittee on International Trade, Investment and Monetary Affairs, and two Congressional staff assistants. The CoDel was accompanied by seven private sector advisors who paid their own trip costs privately.

Congressman Mickey Leland, who had traveled to the Republic of Cuba on a separate trip, participated in the meetings with President Fidel Castro on Cayo Piedras and in the general conference on Wednesday.

SUMMARY

Discussions with Cuban government leaders, observations and contact with individual Cubans, not involved in the discussions with government officials confirmed some conclusions gained during a shorter visit in August, 1984. These are:

1. President Castro and his government are interested in achieving improved relations with the United States. As in August, President Castro maintained that he had sent signals on this to the U.S. more than once in the past, specifically citing a July 26, 1984, speech as one of the more recent examples. He is apparently convinced the U.S. government, through the time of the January visit, has not treated his signals with the seriousness he believes they warrant.

2. President Castro appears to perceive the principal U.S. interest in improved relations with Cuba to be, primarily, political—the opportunity to improve the U.S. image among Latin American nations and among Third World nations.

3. The interest of the Cubans in improved U.S.-Cuban relations is, at a minimum at least, primarily economic rather than rooted in significant changes of belief in the value of a "socialist" system to poor, less developed Third World nations.

4. Negotiations between the U.S. and Cuba, on virtually any issue, will be complicated by President Castro's concern for maintaining Cuba's perceived position of leadership in the Third World and could become impossible if the Cubans' perceive the U.S. attitude toward Cuba to patronizing in any degree.

These conclusions were drawn or confirmed during extended discussions with President Castro and other Cuban government officials. These discussions included a final general session in which seven questions, prepared before departure for Cuba, were asked. The bases for these conclusions are described in the following sections.

EVIDENCE OF INTEREST IN IMPROVED RELATIONS

President Castro stated clearly, as he had not done in August, that his government is willing to "exchange views" with the U.S. on "problems in Central America", specifically on issues relating to Nicaragua and El Salvador. At the same time, he agreed that neither the U.S. nor Cuba could negotiate for a third nation and stated that Cuba would support the decision reached by the Nicaraguan government. He expressed a willingness to support simultaneous withdrawal from Central America of foreign military forces.

President Castro expressed a willingness to cooperate in the Contadora efforts to obtain a general peace agreement in Central America and that he would support "verification" related to such agreement. He indicated that he would support verification activities being carried out by representatives of Contadora nations and/or representatives of Western European nations and that the verifications program personnel should be "civilian" rather than "military". He described as "good" the efforts of El Salvadoran President Duarte to negotiate with Salvadoran guerrilla movement leaders a peaceful resolution of the conflict in that Central American nation.

President Castro expressed a willingness to "exchange views" with the U.S. on issues relating to Angola and Namibia, Africa, with the objective of supporting efforts to obtain peaceful resolutions in this region.

Apparently based on the disparity between the distances from Cuba to Angola and from South Africa to Namibia, he stated he would not support simultaneous withdrawal of foreign military forces.

As he had done in August, President Castro, and other Cuban officials, cited the example of U.S. relations with the Peoples Republic of China as evidence of their contention that "capitalist" and "socialist" nations need not be enemies and could coexist.

President Castro arranged for the CoDel to visit with him on Cayo Piedras from mid-afternoon Monday through 5 p.m. Tuesday. During two extended sessions, totaling approximately 11 hours, free-ranging discussions were encouraged on subjects as widely diverse as political philosophy, economic organization, religion and environmental protection.

In addition to the Cayo Piedras discussions, President Castro met with the U.S. party individually, in small groups and as a whole for approximately fourteen and a half hours beginning at 11 a.m. on Wednesday, January 16, and running to about 1:30 a.m. Thursday.

Based on requests made by the CoDel, the Cuban government arranged meetings with the Minister of Foreign Trade, the President and some of the leadership of the Cuban National Academy of Sciences, the Vice President for education, and the Minister of the Fishing Industry and two of his Deputy Ministers. The shortest of these scheduled meetings ran for approximately two hours. No restrictions were placed on the subjects which might be discussed or on the questions which might be asked. Although, in some instances, answers to questions were general and given with reluctance, there were no flat refusals to answer questions which were pursued.

The Cubans appeared eager for the CoDel to see some of the things the government has accomplished. They arranged for the CoDel to visit two boarding schools for secondary education students—one near Santa Maria de los Banos for Cuban students and one on the Isle of Youth which Cuba sponsors for students from Ghana, Africa, the "Old Havana City" area where a major historic preservation and renewal program is underway, and a marine reserve at Isle of Youth.

Cuban leaders point to the spread of education and health services to all areas of the island nation as a major post-revolution achievement.

No obvious restrictions were placed on movements by individual members of the U.S. party.

Throughout the trip the Cubans, ranging from interpreters and foreign ministry officials to President Castro, maintained a conspicious attitude of friendly, courteous hospitality. Cubans who were not among the officials assigned to work with the CoDel appeared to be friendly and displayed no more reserve in dealing with the U.S. party than would be considered normal among strangers in the United States.

EVIDENCE OF CUBAN PERCEPTION OF U.S. INTEREST

When pressed for an answer to a question concerning U.S. government response to signals he said he has sent indicating an interest in improved relations, President Castro said the response relating to these, received by his government, were indirect and/or low level.

In a separate meeting, officials of the U.S. Interest Section in Cuba, during a briefing of the CoDel, had stated that these signals had been followed-up and that the evaluation of the Cuban response had been that the Cubans were not willing to move from generalities to specifics.

President Castro was even more firm in the January meetings than he had been in August, in attempting to counter the perceived U.S. belief that Cuba is a proxy for the Soviet Union. He restated his contention that Cuba is a sovereign nation which makes its own foreign policy.

President Castro repeatedly indicated his belief that the U.S. can improve or damage its relations with the Third World nations, including those of Central America, through its actions in connection with the Contadora negotiations and the South African-Namibian-Angolan situation.

In addition to the Central American and African problems, President Castro indicated an interest in cooperating with the U.S. on deterring aircraft hijacking, "this problem of radio interference", and coast guard cooperation on ocean transportation matters, particularly emergencies at sea. These were listed when he was asked whether there were areas other than the immigration area, on which the U.S. and Cuba have recently reached a new agreement, in which he believed the U.S. and Cuba might achieve agreement.

CUBA'S ECONOMIC INTEREST IN CUBA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

Throughout the discussions conducted with the Cuban President and other officials there was a strong thread of interest in reaching accommodation on economic issues.

President Castro has publicly announced to the Cubans a goal of increasing, by 20 percent, export trade in hard currency markets. He had told the Cuban people there is a need for increased production for export and that they should not expect to increase domestic consumption in the near future.

President Castro and other Cuban officials specifically mentioned, during economic discussions, that Cuba does not have access to the U.S. market. Also, there was specific mention of Cuba's interest in expanding its tourism industry, in discussions of fisheries issues, in the development of joint ventures in manufacturing areas and in tripartite trade agreements.

The interest in tourism development had been raised during the August visit. The Cuban government has adopted a foreign investment law, and President Castro had stated in August that he believes there can be a place for foreign private business and industrial investment in a "socialist" economy. President Castro indicated, in January, he had urged the Nicaraguan government not to be inflexible in its opposition to foreign investment.

In response to a question from Congressman Leach about whether he had considered adopting the "China model" represented by the movement toward a more market-oriented economy in the Peoples Republic of China, President Castro said "all the problems of centralization have not been solved" and that "socialist nations should learn what capitalism has to teach about management". In August, he had said "socialist" nations needed to learn to stimulate the competition, innovation and production that is an inherent part of capitalism.

A new law allows Cubans to own their own homes. As a spur to production, factory managers are permitted to circumvent Havana's central planners by making deals with others and supermarkets are opening which have scarce, high-priced, consumer goods as their only products. Although farmers may own land, a limit of 166.6 acres has been in force for most of the post-revolution years. The Cuban government owns between 50 and 60 percent of the farmland.

CLIMATE FOR FUTURE NEGOTIATIONS

President Castro repeatedly emphasized as essential elements in any negotiations between nations: respect, flexibility and fairness.

As in August, President Castro emphasized the need for recognizing that Third World nations, including Cuba, "are proud" nations, are "independent" and must be "respected".

The only times the cordiality of the discussions, informal and formal, cooled were when the Cubans might have perceived the discussions to have been taking a tinge of "patronization".

WALLOPING MIDDLE-INCOME FOLKS

(Mr. WILLIAMS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, we have a saying in this Nation: the rich take care of themselves. The Government helps the poor and the middle class pays the way for both. It is those middle-class Americans that will now feel the sting if the President's budget proposals are adopted. Middle-income workers will feel that sting because this President adamantly, stubbornly refuses to cut defense spending and, therefore, he has to go after the middle class.

Let me give you an example. The President wants to eliminate middle-income students from college loans, work study, direct student loans, and grants. He wants to cut 1 million middle-income students off of that assistance.

He refuses to cut defense spending and yet the Defense Department spends in 23 hours the total of the savings that the President gets by cutting 1 million middle-income American students from these college assistance efforts.

In other areas the President intends to cut $160 million from the Summer Youth Program. The Pentagon spends that in 3 hours.

He intends to cut $122 million from America's disabled workers. The Pentagon spends that in 2½ hours.

He intends to totally eliminate the Job Corps in this country. The Pentagon will spend that saving in 13 hours.

This President is preparing to wallop middle-income people who pay the way in this country because he will not touch the Pentagon.

A TRIBUTE TO RICHARD C. TONGG

(Mr. AKAKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, it is a great honor and privilege for me today to bring to the attention of my colleagues a beloved and great citizen of Hawaii, Richard C. Tongg, whose 85th birthday we celebrated recently.

Richard, Uncle Dick as he is affectionately and respectfully called, is an outstanding and talented citizen of Hawaii and of America, contributing as he did to our war effort during World War II, our economic well-being, and our entertainment world. We thank and salute him for his genius and artistry in landscaping, and for sharing so much, and for giving so much.

Hawaii thanks him for his meritorious service to our home and country during World War II. Under the command of Lt. Gen. Robert C. Richardson, Jr., commanding general, U.S. Army Forces, central Pacific area, he commanded the Hawaii Defense Volunteers, Hawaii's multiracial civilian home guard unit, a regiment of troops, trained and charged with guarding Hawaii's vital shorelines and installations.

Hawaii thanks him, too, for devoted service during World War II while serving on the Food Rations Board of the Office of Price Administration.

Hawaii thanks him for bringing competitive air travel service to the islands in 1946 when he and his brother, Ruddy F. Tongg, founded Aloha Airlines—originally Transpacific Airlines—well known to all as the people's airline because of its pledge of service with the spirit of aloha to Hawaii's multiracial community.

Hawaii thanks him for 60 years of beautiful gardens in Hawaii, and for national award winning landscaping designs for Honolulu's International Airport, Hilo's Waiakea Resort Hotel, and Maui's Hyatt, Kapalua, and Wailea Beach Hotel, and others. And, for coauthoring with Lorraine Kuck, the book "The Modern Tropical Garden."

Richard, Uncle Dick, mahalo for everything you did for Hawaii and for all of us. We honor and love you, and we wish you a happy and joyous 85th birthday, and many happy returns.

REAGAN'S PROPOSALS FOR VETERANS' BENEFITS

(Mr. EDWARDS of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, this morning I reviewed President Reagan's budget proposal with regard to our Nation's veterans. He wants to increase the military budget by $30 billion, but cut veteran programs.

President Reagan is now making distinctions between the types of veterans, dividing them into "deserving" and "nondeserving" classes. Mr. Speaker, I remind our colleagues of—and regret that the President ignores—the fact that our debt is owed to every veteran who honorably served our country.

Just as our aging veteran population is reaching 65, the President's proposals are designed to ensure that these aging veterans will not be eligible for care in the VA hospital system. The President has developed a means test for eligibility for care and projects a so-called saving of $3.2 billion. This is a false savings if I've ever seen one and, mark my words, reneging on our commitment in this manner will come back to haunt us.

Just as our aging veteran population is reaching 65, the President proposes to cut the funds for new VA hospitals and nursing homes by $157 million. Who is being fooled here? Currently, nondisabled veterans over 65 can only get into VA hospitals if there are empty beds available. By cutting funds for nursing home and hospital construction, the President is ensuring that, even if the veterans meets his proposed means test, space will not be available.

I deplore these proposals and I ask my colleagues to join with me in refusing to allow the President to abandon our elderly veterans.

REPEAL CONTEMPORANEOUS RECORDKEEPING

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, I know that each and every Member of Congress has received a flood of mail protesting proposed regulations by the IRS which radically shift recordkeeping requirements on the part of farmers, salesmen, small business men and women, just to name a few. Most everyone with business rather than bureaucratic experience agrees with the protestors. The Congress and the IRS have gone too far; the cure is worse than the disease; the contemporaneous accounting provisions ought to be repealed.

Cosponsor H.R. 600 to repeal this provision. We have more than 100 cosponsors and are headed toward 200. We need you.

The Committee on Ways and Means has a tough job of balancing equity with revenue and frankly some of its members and staff are hoping to finesse this provision; are hoping that the IRS can keep changing the regulations to temper the outrage but maintain contemporaneous recordkeeping.

Let the Committee on Ways and Means and IRS know how we feel about this. Cosponsor H.R. 600. Let us send them a message by the way of 218-plus Members. We will pay our taxes but we will not spend our working days keeping records for the IRS. Enough is enough.

Cosponsor H.R. 600; repeal contemporaneous recordkeeping now.

MILLARD FILLMORE CALDWELL, A FLORIDA GIANT

(Mr. FUQUA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, on October 23, 1984, the people of Florida mourned the passing of one of the great men in Florida's history. Millard F. Caldwell died on October 23 at the age of 87 and his passing is a sad occasion for generations of Floridians who knew him for his many accomplishments in a lifetime of public service.

Mr. Caldwell attended college at the University of Mississippi and the University of Virginia before enlisting in the Army in World War I. He was commissioned a second lieutenant in the field artillery and, after his wartime service, he studied law and was admitted to the bar in Florida.

After service as prosecuting attorney and country attorney in Santa Rosa County, he served 4 years in the Florida House of Representatives. He was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1932 and served until 1941 when he chose to return to Florida to practice law.

Never one to shirk his responsibility to his State and Nation, he chose to run for Governor in 1944 because he perceived the fact that strong leadership was needed. He was elected and served one term as Florida's Chief Executive.

In 1950, after once again having returned from public service, he was persuaded by President Truman to return to Washington as Administrator of the Federal Civil Defense Administration. He led the postwar effort to improve our civil defense capability for 2 years before turning once again to private life.

Some would have felt that these accomplishments would be enough for any mortal but Millard Caldwell rose to the occasion once again and began service in 1962 as a member of the Florida Supreme Court. In 1967 he became chief justice.

In 1969 he decided that he wanted to spend more time on his farm and he retired from the court.

All of these facts and dates tell part of the story but they do not tell the whole story of Millard Caldwell. He was a tall, distinguished looking man of erect bearing. His mere presence let you know that you were in the company of an accomplished individual.

He was a man of his word and his honesty and forthrightness were respected by all.

He has left a magnificent legacy of public service to all in Florida who came after him. His accomplishments may never be equaled and his name will live forever in the annals of Florida history.

PRESIDENT REAGAN SHOULD VISIT THE NAZI CONCENTRATION CAMP

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the officials of the Reagan administration indicated last week that the President has decided against visiting a Nazi concentration camp when he visits West Germany later this year in May at about the time of the 40th anniversary of V-E Day, the victory over nazism.

The President is said to believe that even though the West Germans suggested visiting such a camp it would in some way be unfair to present day Germans to do so.

I urge the President to rethink his decision. World War II was waged against the evil of Adolf Hitler's nazism. The deliberate murder in those camps of 6 million Jews and millions of other nationalities whom the Nazis considered to be inferior was the ugliest aspect of nazism.

Not to recall that by a Presidential visit to such a camp at the time of the commemoration of V-E Day is to desecrate the memory of all those people killed by the Nazis as well as all those Americans and others who fought and died to defeat Nazi Germany.

Mr. Speaker, an article by Charles Krauthammer, which appeared last week in the Washington Post, addresses the matter cogently. I include it in the RECORD at this point:

HOW NOT TO REMEMBER WORLD WAR II

(By Charles Krauthammer)

Ever since President Reagan went to Omaha Beach last year to commemorate the 40th anniversary of D-Day, we have been engaged in an historical reenactment, 1½ generations removed, of the march of Allied armies across Europe. Last year it was Normandy. This week, the liberation of Auschwitz. Soon other milestones: the crossing of the Rhine, Hitler's death and finally the surrender of Germany and V-E Day.

Why the obsessive need to mark every painful station of the cross?

In part it has to do with the magnitude of the event: a war that created our world, the "postwar" world, de-Nazified, bipolar and nuclear. In part it has to do with the nature of the interval that separates us from the event. Why, after all, the great celebrations now, and not in 1975 or '65 or '95? Forty years, the Biblical span, has a peculiar hold on the Western imagination. It is the ellipsis, the wait and the wandering, between deliverance and redemption. Now is about the time we should be coming to the Promised Land. Perhaps because we can catch no sight of it, we look back so anxiously and nostalgically to the exodus.

Still, if satisfying anxiety and nostalgia were the only reason, month-by-month observances would indeed be excessive. There is a deeper reason for remembering the war. It has to do with pedagogy.

Consider two items. Last Friday SS Maj. Walter Reder, who led the 1944 reprisal murder of 1,830 Italian civilians, returned home from prison in Italy. At the airport to greet him was Austria's minister of defense.

A few days earlier, the West German chancellor agreed to address a rally of German exiles who dream of returning to their homeland in what is now Poland. Their slogan is "Forty years of banishment: Silesia remains our future in a Europe of free peoples." This was toned down from the original "Silesia remains ours." Either way, it is in poor taste. In the shadow of V-E Day, it defiantly echoes Hitler's idea ("ein Volk, ein Reich, ein Fuhrer") of uniting all Germans in a Greater Germany.

This is not to say, as does Soviet propaganda, that Chancellor Helmut Kohl is a revanchist; only that domestic politics inclines him to gloss over some unpleasant history. Younger Germans may never have learned that history to begin with. They show (the Greens, in particular) a growing tendency to blame the partition of Germany on a conspiracy of the superpowers, especially the United States. They need reminding exactly how American and Soviet armies came to meet in Berlin in the first place. A commemoration of the war Germany started helps.

But what kind of commemoration? That has become something of a diplomatic problem. Last year the Germans were miffed that they were not invited to the celebration of D-Day. They felt that after 40 years of good Western citizenship they deserved a place at Normandy. Moreover, exclusion created domestic problems for the pro-Western Kohl: the anti-NATO opposition was able to argue that the West refuses to accept Germany, and yet makes it bear the burdens and dangers of alliance.

So the idea this time is to include Germany and tone things down. President Reagan said that V-E Day ceremonies are not for "rejoicing [over] victory and recalling the hatred that went on at the time." Accordingly: no concentration camps on Reagan's V-E Day itinerary. "The president thinks we should try to put this behind us," said one administration official. The idea is to underscore "reconciliation."

No doubt the sanitized ceremonies will do something to secure the political fortunes of our friends in West Germany. However, tact has its price. In this case it is truth.

World War II did have a happy ending in which a remnant of Germany was able to lead it back to civilized life. The point of the war, however, was not rehabilitating Germany, but saving the world from it. To emphasize the first, and suppress the second, is not only to reverse cause and effect, but to distort the meaning of the war.

What is at stake is not just historical, but moral truth. This was the most just of wars against the most radical of evils. The reason for recalling that is not to punish Kohl and modern Germany for the sins of 40 years ago, but to teach a new generation exactly what the fight from Omaha Beach to Berlin was for, and against.

The president is a gracious winner. He doesn't like to belabor victories. But this is not a budget battle with Congress, or a win in the Electoral College. This is World War II. Nearly half a million Americans and millions of others died for it. Can we not discretely ask our German friends to sit this one out? There will be time enough to celebrate their remarkable moral rebirth. That came after V-E Day 1945. Its remembrance, too, can wait until after V-E Day 1985.

REGULATIONS ON ADEQUATE CONTEMPORANEOUS RECORDS

(Mr. HORTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my strong support for the bills H.R. 531 and H.R. 600 introduced by my friends Congressmen ANTHONY and ROEMER. These bills will repeal the new IRS regulations on "adequate contemporaneous records" which place an unreasonable paperwork burden on the taxpayers of America.

From 1974 to 1977, I chaired the Commission on Federal Paperwork. During that time, the Commission worked diligently to review Federal paperwork requirements and made recommendations to enable the Federal Government to serve the American people more efficiently and effectively. The regulations on adequate contemporaneous records mark a significant departure from the efforts we in Congress made to reduce the paperwork burden and the instrusion of the Government into the daily lives of the American people.

I would like to share with you a portion of my 1977 transmittal letter from the final report of the Paperwork Commission which is very pertinent to these new regulations:

The theme we heard repeatedly throughout the country is that the vast majority of Americans want to obey the law. Most Americans want to cooperate and participate in furthering Federal programs and national goals. However, these people can be frustrated by a Government which, in their view, does not trust them.

Many people feel, and the Commission agrees, that a multibillion dollar wall of paperwork has been erected between the government and the people. Countless reporting and recordkeeping requirements and other heavy-handed investigation and monitoring schemes have been instituted based on what we view as a faulty premise that people will not obey laws and rules unless they are checked, monitored, and rechecked.

This situation and this assumption must be reversed if we are to restore efficiency within Government and confidence in Government by the people and if we are to realize the potential for cooperative attainment of our goals as a Nation. Many of the major conclusions and recommendations of the Commission on Federal Paperwork are aimed at this goal.

I believe those words and that philosophy are as true today as they were in 1977. Citizens, by and large, have no problem maintaining necessary tax records. But the recordkeeping required in these regulations is, at the very least, excessive, burdensome and beyond reason. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 531 and H.R. 600 and join the effort to remove this burden and restore a more responsible and effective policy. This change will be appreciated by millions of taxpayers across the country.

MANDELA FREEDOM RESOLUTION HAS BEGUN TO BEAR FRUIT

(Mr. CROCKETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, the Mandela freedom resolution, which passed the House last September, has begun to bear fruit. South African President Botha has announced his government's willingness to grant a conditioned release for Nelson Mandela, the black South African leader who has been imprisoned for more than 20 years. President Botha knew, of course, that the condition he attached was totally unacceptable since it would require a pledge by Mr. Mandela and the banned African National Congress not to resort to violence in their revolutionary struggle against apartheid.

The significance of his offer, however—and the further announcement of the suspension of South Africa's program of forced resettlement of black communities—is the fact that each of these developments is an obvious and welcomed response to the pressures exerted upon South Africa by our congressional action and by the current "Free South Africa Movement."

As we have pointed out many times, Mr. Speaker, the South African Government must begin to communicate with all of its people in the search for a just, a rapid, and a nonviolent end to apartheid. The unconditional release of Nelson Mandela and an end to forced resettlements are necessary steps toward accommodation and reconciliation.

WHY IS THE ADMINISTRATION PROPOSING TO PUT FAMILY FARMS AND RURAL HOSPITALS OUT OF BUSINESS?

(Mr. BEDELL asked and was given perimission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have had quite a morning. I started with a meeting with the Secretary of Agriculture in which he explained how we are going to destroy the family farm. Then I met with people from rural hospitals who pointed out that this administration has put in a differential which is probably going to close down a large number of our rural hospitals because of the fact that it costs a lot less to provide services in rural hospitals than it does in urban hospitals.

Mr. Speaker, this country was built upon efficiency. Does it make any sense to anyone that we would close our rural hospitals where costs are less and send everybody to the cities where the costs are more?

This country was also built upon efficiency in business. It is recognized that small business provides most of our jobs, most of our creativity, so what are we doing? We are eliminating taxes for big business, and we are leaving small business to continue to pay those taxes, so the GE's, Westinghouses, Du Ponts, and others pay no taxes whatsoever.

Now we want to eliminate the Small Business Administration. If that were not enough, I met with the Secretary; now he wants to destroy the family farm, the most efficient type of agriculture production we have ever had in the world, and now we will destroy it.

Mr. Speaker, my God, how long is this madness going to continue in our society?

HIGHLIGHTS OF THE PRESIDENT'S FISCAL YEAR 1986 BUDGET—A MISNOMER DEFENSE BUDGET—UNREAL INCREASES

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. AKAKA). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, for the interest of my colleagues, several of my House and Senate colleagues and myself were called to the White House this morning for a briefing on the President's so-called fiscal year 1986 budget and were given a pamphlet called the "Highlights and Information Summary."

We were told about the tremendous reductions in social programs and the huge increases in defense spending. Of equal concern was not just the reductions in nondefense areas but almost the entire elimination of many programs essential for the American people.

Some of those reductions called for in the budget areas follows: disadvantaged education; handicapped education; employment training grants and programs; Older Americans Act; social services block grants; Head Start programs; Foster Care child welfare; handicapped rehabilitation services; Maternal and Child Health Services block grants; low income energy; and right down the line. All programs that are directly affecting the way of life and human needs are being reduced.

Then we look at the defense budget and find this tremendous increase. They are increasing the DOD request by 10.8 percent for fiscal year 1986. Meanwhile, in the last 5 years DOD has received over $1.1 trillion, and in the next 5 years they are requesting double that amount or over $2 trillion.

It is beyond me how the President can request huge sums for the production of MX missiles, B-1 bombers and other major weapons systems which add nothing or only marginally add to our national defense, while reducing other important nondefense programs.

I believe my colleagues must be aware of how the President proposes to finance this large increase in the defense budget. The President proposes to reduce or eliminate certain human needs programs, incur a budget deficit of $180 billion for fiscal year 1986 and continue large deficit financing in the foreseeable future.

I will include in the RECORD a list showing the major reductions and the terminations which are proposed by this administration, and the President so proudly set forth in the highlights of his fiscal year 1986 budget.

The administration speaks of only a 5.9-percent real increase in budget authority, but then when one looks at the outlay projections we suddenly find that it is no longer a 5.9-percent real increase but actually a 13.5 percent, or an increase of over $32.1 billion.

While DOD has received all these large increases, we find that the Pentagon has unexpended balances of $243.4 billion estimated for fiscal year 1985 and with this budget the unexpended balances will increase to $279.6 billion. And who will pay for that increase? The middle class, and those who are in need.

Mr. President, I do not believe it should be called the "highlights." I believe it should be called by its true name, the destruction of our American society. I attach a list showing the major reductions and terminations proposed in the fiscal year 1986 budget:

ANALYSIS OF THE FISCAL YEAR 1986 DEFENSE BUDGET

Mr. Speaker, the fiscal year 1986 Defense budget estimate for those items included in the annual Defense appropriations bill totals $303.9 billion. The fiscal year 1986 Defense budget represents an increase of $29.5 billion more than the $274.4 billion appropriated and made available to date for fiscal year 1985. The fiscal year 1986 request is 10.8 percent more than the fiscal year 1985 appropriations.

The press release of Secretary of Defense Weinberger alludes to a real increase in fiscal year 1986 budget authority of 5.9 percent after adjustments for anticipated inflation. This real increase, of course, refers to the total Department of Defense budget which includes military construction, family housing, and certain supplementals and contingencies anticipated in both fiscal year 1985 and 1986.

The figures supplied by the Department of Defense anticipate proposed supplementals for fiscal year 1985 of $2.6 billion for increased pay costs. This supplemental would cover the cost associated with the 3.5 percent civilian pay raise and the 4 percent military pay raise effective January 1, 1985, and the proposed military pay raise of 3 percent effective July 1, 1985.

The Department of Defense figures also include an amount of $1.8 billion for fiscal year 1986 to cover military pay raises. The budget proposes a military pay raise of 3 percent, effective July 1, 1985. The defense figures also include a 5-percent civilian pay reduction effective January 1, 1986, which amounts to a reduction of $1.1 billion.

The outlays estimated in the accounts covered in the annual Defense appropriations bill total $270.1 billion for fiscal year 1986 as compared with $238.0 billion in fiscal year 1985 to date. The $32.1 billion increase in outlays in fiscal year 1986 equates to a 13.5 percent increase which exceeds the 10.8 percent increase projected in budget authority. Even with this increase in outlays, unexpended balances will continue to grow in the various Defense accounts.

The budget authority increase in fiscal year 1986 over fiscal year 1985 for the Defense bill alone, is distributed by military service as follows:

	Fiscal year 1985	Fiscal year 1986	Increase
Army	$70.7	$78.2	+$7.5
Navy	93.4	102.0	+8.6
Air Force	96.7	107.1	+10.4
OSD/Defense agencies	13.1	16.5	+3.4

Another interesting comparison is the budget authority increase in fiscal year 1986 over fiscal year 1985 for the Defense bill alone as distributed by appropriation accounts:

[In billions of dollars]

	Fiscal year 1985	Fiscal year 1986	Increase	Percentage increase
Operation and maintenance	$77.5	$82.4	+$4.9	+6.3
Procurement	97.1	106.8	+9.7	+10.0
Research, development, test and evaluation	31.2	39.3	+8.1	+26.0

The above figures emphasize the trend toward large growth rates in the investment accounts (procurement and RDT&E) while the operation and maintenance accounts receive much smaller increases. This situation will result in the need to provide large amounts of funds in the outyears to pay for these major weapons systems resulting in less funding availability for the troops in the field and other readiness programs. Readiness will have to suffer further in order to finance this bow wave of new weapons systems coming on line in future years.

MILITARY PERSONNEL

Overall funding for active and reserve manpower requirements increases by about $5 billion to a total of $73.4 billion for fiscal year 1986. A summary table follows:

SUMMARY OF BUDGET REQUEST FOR ACTIVE AND RESERVE FORCES

[In millions of dollars]

	Fiscal year 1985—			Fiscal year 1986	Change
	Enacted	Supplementals and transfers	Total fiscal year 1985
Active Forces	59,056	1,377	60,433	64,339	+3,906
Reserve Forces	7,840	60	7,900	9,086	+1,186
Total	66,896	1,437	68,333	73,425	+5,092

Included in the above amounts for military personnel are their pay and allowances, payments to the military retired pay fund, plus the funds required to move personnel between duty stations and the funds needed to provide subsistence to enlisted personnel.

The major increases in the military personnel budget result from the 26,000 increase in active duty end strengths and 47,000 increase in reserve component end strengths. There are also increases resulting from annualization of the fiscal year 1985 pay raise and new initiatives on the part of the Defense Department concerning special and incentive pay, bonuses, and permanent change of station [PCS] travel reimbursements.

The Department has provided for a 3-percent military pay raise effective July 1, 1985, within the Defensewide contingency portion of the overall budget request. If approved, this pay raise would add $450 million in fiscal year 1985 and $1.8 billion in fiscal year 1986 above amounts required under current military pay rates.

SUMMARY OF ACTIVE DUTY END STRENGTH

	1985 authorization	1986 request	Change fiscal year 1985 to fiscal year 1986
Army	781	781	0
Navy	571	586	+15
Marine Corps	198	199	+1
Total, Defense active duty	2,152	2,178	+26

End strength for active duty forces is proposed to increase by approximately 26,000 in fiscal year 1986 to a total of 2,152,000. Retention and recruiting experience in recent years has been excellent. End strength goals have been achieved and quality has improved. Even with the pay raise being capped at 4 percent for fiscal year 1985, the military departments still anticipate achieving their 1985 strength goals. Important issues to be addressed for fiscal year 1986 are the need for increases in military compensation and the advisability of increasing the number of military personnel, especially in light of administration efforts to reduce the deficit. It should be noted that while the administration proposes a 3-percent pay increase for military, they also propose a 5-percent reduction in civil service pay.

SUMMARY OF GUARD AND RESERVE END STRENGTH

[In thousands]

	Fiscal year 1985 authorization	Fiscal year 1986 request	Change fiscal year 1985 to fiscal year 1986
Army Reserve	286	301	+15
Navy Reserve	129	142	+13
Marine Corps Reserve	42	43	+1
Air Force Reserve	75	77	+2
Army National Guard	438	450	+12
Air National Guard	108	111	+3
Total Guard/Reserve	1077	1124	+47

End strength for the Guard and Reserves is proposed to increase by 47,000 to a total of 1,124,000 for fiscal year 1986. The proposed increases result from additional full-time support personnel, additional individual mobilization augmentees and additional paid drilling reservists.

One of the major issues to again be addressed in fiscal year 1986 is the number of and management of full-time support personnel, both Active Guard/Reserve [AGR] and military—civilian—technicians.

In the operations and maintenance area, the budget requests $82.5 billion in fiscal year 1986, an increase of $5 billion or 6.4 percent above the $77.5 billion already appropriated for fiscal year 1985. In addition, the administration has announced that it will be requesting a fiscal year 1985 supplemental totaling $721 million for civilian pay increases taking effect January 1, 1985. In real terms, the fiscal year 1986 request for O&M is up 6.1 percent. In actual purchasing power, this is larger than any amount since the final year of World War II when we had over 12 million troops in combat all over the globe. In fiscal year 1986, DOD will have only 2,178,000 military personnel on active duty.

These appropriations finance the costs of operating and maintaining the Armed Forces, including the Reserve components and related support activities of the Department of Defense, except military personnel costs. Included are amounts for pay of civilians, contract services for maintenance of equipment and facilities, fuel, supplies, and repair parts for weapons and equipment. Financial requirements are influenced by many factors, including force levels such as the number of aircraft squadrons, Army or Marine Corps divisions, installations, military strength and deployments, rates of operational activity, and quantity and complexity of major equipment—aircraft, ships, missiles, tanks, et cetera—in operation.

The budget as proposed for fiscal year 1986 provides day-to-day support to meet the higher levels of readiness being recommended. For example, major increases include $264 million for flying hours in all services, $400 million for Army force modernization, $450 million for support to the Reserve components, $250 million in airlift/sealift operations, $230 million for ship modernization, $172 million for space support increases, and $325 million for logistics support programs. Despite these increases, the continuing need to improve the readiness of our military forces is not uniformly reflected throughout the operation and maintenance accounts. For example, at a time when the investment appropriations are increasing at twice the rate of real growth of the operating accounts, the backlog of maintenance and repair of real property increases in fiscal year 1986 and depot maintenance funding remains roughly level with the number of ship overhauls decreasing from 55 in fiscal year 1985 to only 35 in fiscal year 1986.

One of the areas that is an indicator of the readiness of our military forces is flying hours. It is noted that in fiscal year 1986, Army flying hours will increase by approximately 100,000 hours. Also it is noted that the Navy flying hour program will increase by 100,000 while the Air Force flying hour program will grow by 80,000 hours. Although the Congress traditionally has supported increases in flying hours as being real contributions toward military readiness, such substantial increases for the Navy and the Air Force must be viewed in the perspective that in fiscal year 1985 the Department of Defense suggested that reductions could be made to both the Navy and Air Force flying hour requests since they would not be able to use the money to fly the programs originally included in the President's budget request.

The proposed fiscal year 1986 budget includes a reduction of 5 percent, or $1.1 billion, in civilian manpower pay. While the budget reflects this reduction, it will be the responsibility of Congress to approve this pay cut.

There is clearly a concern about the quality of health care for military personnel. However, during this time of budget austerity, Congress will be scrutinizing all requests for additional health care appropriations for their reasonableness and financial implications.

The Department of Defense has requested an additional 19,000 civilian manpower spaces, 10,000 of which are for Air Force needs. These spaces will support maintenance and readiness functions throughout the Department. With this increased manpower and the elimination of end strength ceilings, the committee anticipates a more cost effective use of resources, increased productivity and readiness.

The operation and maintenance budget also includes an increase of $531 million reflecting the revised definition of what is an expense item which may be funded in the O&M accounts as opposed to an investment item to be funded in the procurement accounts. While judgment will be reserved on this until a more detailed explanation can be received during the course of hearings, it appears questionable at this time as to the wisdom of permitting an operating account to purchase a multimillion-dollar item and label it as an expense as opposed to a capital investment.

STOCK FUNDS

In fiscal year 1986 the Department is requesting a total of $1.9 billion for stock funds in the Department of Defense. This is $306 million higher than enacted in fiscal year 1985. These funds provide for repair parts and supplies for peacetime as well as wartime operations and are critical to our capability to sustain our military forces over protracted conflicts, as well as to provide adequate training during peacetime.

PROCUREMENT

The proposed fiscal year 1986 procurement budget is $106.8 billion, an increase of $9.7 billion or 10 percent over the $97.1 billion made available in fiscal year 1985. For the fourth year in a row, the increase for procurement again represents the largest increase of any category in the new Defense budget. The increase is in addition to the 26.4-percent increase in fiscal year 1981 over fiscal year 1980, the 30.5 percent increase in fiscal year 1982 over fiscal year 1981, the 23.5-percent increase in fiscal year 1983 over fiscal year 1982, the 6.5-percent increase in fiscal year 1984 over fiscal year 1983, and the 12.1 percent increase in fiscal year 1985 over fiscal year 1984. An additional $1.5 billion in prior year unobligated balances is available for fiscal year 1985 MX missile procurement if Congress approves authorization and appropriation legislation this year.

The fiscal year 1986 budget continues the trend, begun in fiscal year 1982, of procurement appropriations surpassing the operation and maintenance appropriations as the largest category in the budget. In fiscal year 1986, procurement is 35 percent of the budget while O&M is 27 percent of the budget.

The fiscal year 1986 budget proposes to delete a separate appropriation for Guard and Reserve equipment procurement which the Congress has provided for the past several years.

The Air Force procurement budget is 44 percent of the total, about the same percentage as the fiscal year 1985 budget submission. This reflects the administration's emphasis on strategic programs like the B-1 bomber and MX missile. To put this into perspective, the amount included just for the B-1 and MX is greater than the total of any of the Army procurement appropriations; it is more than three times the total for Army ammunition, and five time the total for all Marine Corps procurement. Budgeted appropriation totals in fiscal year 1986 show an actual decrease from the fiscal year 1985 levels for Aircraft procurement, Army, procurement of ammunition, Army, shipbuilding and conversion, Navy, procurement, Marine Corps, and aircraft procurement, Air Force.

The budget proposes to start six multiyear procurement programs: M-1 tank fire control system, M-1 tank engine, T-700 series helicopter engines, LHD ships, P-3 Orion patrol aircraft, and MK-46 torpedoes.

ARMY PROCUREMENT

The Army consumes 20 percent of the procurement budget in fiscal year 1986, a total of $21.4 billion. This is an increase of $2 billion, or 10 percent over the amounts made available in the current fiscal year.

The Army aircraft procurement budget if $3.9 billion, a decrease of $48.4 million from last year. The total number of aircraft to be procured is 240, including 18 EH-60A quickfix helicopters, 144 AH-64 attack helicopters, and 78 UH-60A Blackhawk helicopters. This compares with a total of 280 aircraft funded last year. The aircraft spares and repair parts budget goes from $675.9 million to $949.7 million, a 40 percent increase.

The Army missile procurement budget is $3.4 billion, an increase of $219.7 million, or 7 percent over last year. Over 103,000 missiles are budgeted, compared with about 70,000 in the current year. Included in the budget are 585 Patriot air defense missiles, 3,439 Stinger missiles, 6,576 Laser Hellfire air-to-surface missiles, 20,100 TOW antitank missiles, and 300 Chaparral missiles. The budget also includes a continuation of the multiyear contract for the multiple launch rocket system, with 72,000 rockets to be procured.

The budget for procurement of weapons and tracked combat vehicles is $5.7 billion, an increase of $1.2 billion, or 26 percent over last year, the largest increase of any of the Army procurement appropriations. Over 2,400 tracked combat vehicles are budgeted, compared to about 2,100 funded in the current fiscal year. The new budget provides for procurement of 716 Bradley fighting vehicles, and 840 M-1 tanks. The budget also provides for procurement of command post carriers, armored personnel carriers, artillery ammunition support vehicles, and recovery vehicles. For weapons and other combat vehicles, the budget provides $834 million, more than double the amount in the current year. Initial procurement is proposed for a new 120mm mortar. The budget provides for procurement of 117 Sergeant York [DIVAD] air defense systems.

The Army ammunition procurement budget is $2.6 billion, a decrease of $11.3 million from last year. Initial production is again proposed for the GB-2 binary chemical artillery projectile. A chemical demilitarization program is also funded. The budget for production base support increases from $280.6 million to $368.4 million, with a portion of the increase going to chemical weapon production facilities and RDX/HMX explosive manufacturing facilities.

The other procurement, Army budget is $5.7 billion, an increase of $590.3 million or 11 percent. The increase for electronic and telecommunications equipment is $876 million, compared to a $119 million increase in other support equipment, and a decrease of $405 million in tactical and support vehicles.

NAVY PROCUREMENT

The Navy procurement request of $37.4 billion represents nearly 35 percent of the total procurement budget in fiscal year 1986. This increase of $3.2 billion, or 9 percent from the amounts made available in the current fiscal year.

The Navy aircraft procurement budget is $12.1 billion, an increase of $1.2 billion, or 11 percent over last year. The total number of aircraft to be procured is 322 compared with 299 funded the current year. Overall, the aircraft budget includes the procurement of 6 A-6E and 12 EA-6B aircraft, 46 AV-8B V/STOL aircraft for the Marine Corps, 84 F-18 aircraft, 18 F-14 aircraft, 14 CH-53E heavy lift helicopters, 11 AH-1T Sea Cobra helicopters, 18 SH-60B Seahawk helicopters, 9 P-3C Orion aircraft, 6 E-2C Hawkeye aircraft, 6 SH-2F antisubmarine warfare helicopters, 8 C-2 COD aircraft, 12 F-16 Adversary aircraft, 2 E-6A TACAMO aircraft, 38 T-34C trainer aircraft, 9 VH-60 helicopters, and 12 UC-12B/CX airlift aircraft. The aircraft modification budget increases from $1.7 billion to $1.9 billion, and the spares and repair parts budget remains $1.5 billion.

The Navy request for procurement of weapons is $5.6 billion, an increase of $1.3 billion, or 29 percent, over the amount provided for last year—$528 million is requested for procurement related to preparation for production in future years of the new Trident II ballistic missile. A total of 249 sea-launched Tomahawk cruise missiles are requested, up from the 180 provided last year. The total number of tactical missiles, which includes a variety of airborne and shipborne weapons, is requested to rise by 41 percent, from the 6,600 total units funded last year to 9,300 units in the current budget. There also is a 10-percent increase in funding for torpedoes and other related equipment, a category which includes $417 million for procurement of the MK-48 ADCAP torpedo.

The shipbuilding and conversion budget is $11.4 billion, a decrease of $324.4 million, or 3 percent from last year. A total of 40 vessels—new construction, conversion, and major craft—are included in the budget request, which includes the procurement of 1 Trident submarine, 4 SSN-688 attack submarines, 3 Aegis cruisers, 2 LSD-41 landing ships, 1 LHD-1 amphibious assault ship, 4 mine countermeasures ships, 4 MSH-1 coastal mine hunters, 2 T-AO fleet oilers, 2 Surtass ships, 1 AG sound barge, and 12 LCAC landing craft.

The other procurement, Navy budget is $6.6 billion, an increase of 23 percent over last year. The increase is spread across the entire spectrum of budget activities in this multifaceted appropriation.

The Marine Corps procurement budget is $1.7 billion, a decrease of $109.9 million, or 6 percent from last year. Increases are included for ammunition—8 percent—guided missiles and equipment—9 percent—communications and electronics—14 percent—engineering and other equipment—7 percent—and support vehicles—11 percent. These are offset by a large decrease in weapons and tracked combat vehicles.

AIR FORCE PROCUREMENT

The Air Force consumes 44 percent of the procurement budget in fiscal year 1986, a total of $46.6 billion. This is an increase of $4.6 billion, or 11 percent over the amounts made available in the current fiscal year. The Air Force consumes the largest portion of the procurement budget, a fact accounted for in large measure by the procurement programs for the MX missile, tactical fighter aircraft, and the B-1B bomber.

The Air Force aircraft procurement budget is $26.2 billion, which is $22.8 million less than appropriated last year. This appropriation is the largest of all procurement appropriations, more than twice any other. The new budget provides for procurement of 357 aircraft, an increase from the 286 funded in the current year. A total of $5.5 billion is included for procurement of the last 48 B-1B aircraft, which is $1.6 billion less than last year due to previous advance procurement funding. The only new Air Force aircraft in the 1986 budget is the HH-60 helicopter, of which 3 are budgeted. Most other aircraft are funded at higher quantities than last year. These include 48 F-15 aircraft, 180 F-16 aircraft, 12 KC-10 tanker aircraft, 1 MC-130 special mission aircraft, 16 C-5B cargo aircraft, 8 C-20 airlift aircraft, 33 T-46 trainer aircraft, and 8 TR-1/U-2 aircraft. The aircraft modification program decreases by 5 percent to $2.9 billion. Major programs in this category include the B-52 bomber, tactical aircraft, cargo aircraft, tanker aircraft, and the Civil Reserve air force [CRAF]. The aircraft spares budget decreases 7 percent to $4.9 billion due primarily to savings that have resulted from spare parts acquisition reforms.

The Air Force missile procurement budget is $10.9 billion, an increase of $4.0 billion, or 57 percent over the amount appropriated last year. Even if the Congress votes this spring to release $1.5 billion of prior year funds for the MX missile, the growth in this appropriation would still be 36 percent. The budget includes $3.0 billion for 48 MX missiles, which accounts for the largest portion of the increase. The budget proposes to initiate Air Force procurement of the powered GBU-15 glide bomb, and includes initial procurement funding for the new medium range air-to-air missile. Also, the budget includes 95 ground launched cruise missiles, 3,500 Maverick missiles, 1,715 HARM missiles, 425 Sparrow missiles, and 800 Sidewinder missiles. Modification of missiles decreases by 17 percent to $134.5 million while missile spare and repair parts increase by 5 percent to $539.3 million. Other support programs increase by 11 percent to $4.2 billion. This category includes a number of space programs. The budget proposes continued funding of $98 million for the space defense system.

The other procurement, Air Force budget is $9.5 billion, an increase of $676 million, or 8 percent over last year. The munitions and associated equipment budget increases by 30 percent to $1.6 billion. The budget for vehicular equipment remains the same at about $340 million. Electronics and telecommunications equipment increases by 23 percent to $2.8 billion, and other base maintenance and support equipment decreases by 4 percent to $4.8 billion.

DEFENSE AGENCIES

Defense agencies procurement, which represents about 1 percent of the total DOD procurement budget, totals $1.4 billion in the fiscal year 1986 budget. This is an increase of $226 million, or 19 percent over the fiscal year 1985 level. Funding of procurement items for OSD, Defense Nuclear Agency, Defense Communications Agency, Defense Logistics Agency, Defense Intelligence Agency, and other intelligence and related agencies are included in this appropriation.

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT PURCHASES

The budget includes an appropriation request of $59 million for Defense Production Act purchases, an increase of about 500 percent from the $10 million provided in fiscal year 1985.

RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, TEST AND EVALUATION

The fiscal year 1986 budget request for RDT&E of $39.3 billion is $8.1 billion more than was provided for this purpose in fiscal year 1985. This is a 26 percent increase over last year. In constant dollars, the 1986 RDT&E budget shows a 20-percent real growth over the 1985 appropriation, when the administration's projected defense inflation rate of 6 percent is considered. Within the overall RDT&E program, the budget request for basic research and advanced development is up 47 percent in constant dollars over last year, strategic programs are down 3 percent, tactical programs are up 25 percent, intelligence and communications are up 22 percent, and program support is up 9 percent.

The budget includes a total of $3.7 billion for continuation of the strategic defense initiative [SDI], an increase of 164 percent over the $1.4 billion provided last year. The requested sum is the second installment of a 5-year, $26 billion program intended to determine whether it is feasible to develop a defense against strategic ballistic missiles.

In strategic programs, ICBM modernization includes $804 million to continue MX and $625 million to continue the small ICBM. The Air Force has also requested $367 million for continued development of the B-1 bomber, although fiscal year 1986 is the last year for production funding of that aircraft. The Navy budgeted $2.2 billion for the Trident II missile system, and projects that $1.7 billion will be required in fiscal year 1987 for that program.

Major Army tactical programs being continued include antitactical missile—$63 million—light helicopter experimental—$76 million—and advanced antitank weapon—$81 million. The Navy budget request includes continuation of such tactical programs as JVX—$604 million—DDG-51—$101 million—and advanced light weight torpedo—$168 million. Air Force tactical programs being continued include C-17—$454 million—advanced medium range air-to-air missile—$101 million—and advanced tactical fighter—$243 million.

New starts requested for fiscal year 1986 include the Army's air mobility support—$15 million—the Navy's space technology—$14 million—and the Air Force's infrared search and track system—$24 million.

As in previous years, the Air Force is budgeted to receive the largest portion of DOD's RDT&E funds. This year, the relative shares are: Air Force, 40 percent; Navy, 29 percent; Defense agencies, 18 percent; Army, 13 percent.

INTELLIGENCE AND COMMUNICATIONS

The budget request for intelligence, tactical intelligence and related activities, and communications contains significant increases for a number of programs. To a great extent these increases are a continuation of initiatives started in recent years. While some new programs are proposed, the budget request continues to reflect acceptance by the Department of Defense of the need to moderate the initiation of new programs in order to adequately fund existing programs.

In the area of communications, command and control, significant increases are requested in a number of programs, including the following:

Program:	Funding requested
SINCGARS radios (proc.)	$231,300,000
Mobile subscriber equipment (proc.)	335,300,000
ECX aircraft (proc.)	400,200,000
MILSTAR RDT&E	477,800,000

A BILL TO CLARIFY THE POWER OF THE FERC

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, recently a FERC administrative law judge ruled that Arkansas must pay part of the cost for a nuclear plant in another State. Never before has the FERC decided that the people of any State must purchase power from, or pay for unneeded power from an out-of-State powerplant. The need for domestic power has always been within the sovereign power of each State.

Our Public Service Commission which is statutorily charged with the responsibility of making such determination was never asked for, nor did it even give approval for such a plan. Congress clearly never intended for the FERC to interfere with the rights of the States to regulate such matters. Section 201(a) of the Federal Power Act sets the jurisdictional boundaries of the FERC, providing that its regulation shall extend "only to those matters * * * not subject to regulation by the States" and further, "shall not have jurisdiction * * * over facilities used for the generation of electric energy * * *" The legislative history of the Federal Power Act clearly states that Congress, in formulating the act, intended only to fill the existing gaps in the regulatory scheme; it did not intend to remove traditional State regulatory authority.

Large corporations, small businesses, and farms are vital to the economy of Arkansas and this case threatens the existence of our State's industrial base. Also it threatens the survival of our elderly and less fortunate citizens who cannot afford any increase in utility rates. This case could very well be the single greatest threat to the people of Arkansas.

Congress must regain control of the Federal bureaucracy. Once again a nonelected law judge has usurped the powers, we the Congress, gave him. If this ruling stands the law judge in effect has abolished the Pubic Service Commission concept in all 50 States.

My bill clarifies Congress' original intent as to the power of the FERC. Mr. Speaker, I include the text of my bill for the information of my colleagues:

H.R. 931

A bill to amend the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 and the Federal Power Act to clarify the respective regulatory authorities of Federal and State agencies respecting certain transactions by electric utility companies

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. STATE APPROVAL OF CERTAIN ELECTRIC UTILITY TRANSACTIONS.

(a) ISSUANCE OR SALE OF SECURITIES, ETC. BY UTILITY.—Section 10(q) of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 is amended by inserting "(1)" after (g) and by adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(2) Whenever any declaration is filed under this section by an electric utility or by any associate company with respect to any act enumerated in section 6(a), if such act (or any transaction related to such act) could affect the costs of electric energy sold by such electric utility to retail customers, the Commission shall—

"(A) notify each State commission having ratemaking authority over sales of electric energy by the electric utility to its retail customers;

"(B) transmit a copy of such declaration (and all related materials received by the Commission) to the State commission; and

"(C) provide an adequate period for the State commission to determine it approves of such enumerated act.

For purposes of paragraph (1), State laws applicable to an act enumerated in section 6(a) shall not be treated as having been complied with by an electric utility or by any associate company unless each State commission having ratemaking authority over sales of electric energy by the electric utility to retail customers has approved the enumerated act concerned or notified the Commission that no State laws are applicable to that act.".

(b) EXEMPTIONS.—Section 3(d) of such act is amended by adding the following at the end thereof: "No exemption may be granted by the Commission with respect to the requirements of section 10(g)(2).".

SEC. 2. EFFECT OF FERC RATEMAKING DECISIONS ON STATE REGULATORY AUTHORITIES.

Section 201 of the Federal Power Act is amended by adding the following new subsection at the end thereof:

"(g) PASS THROUGH OF COSTS APPROVED BY FERC.—If a State commission has jurisdiction under State law over rates and charges for sales of electric energy by any public utility to consumers within a State or municipality, nothing in this Act shall be construed to prohibit such State commission from—

"(1) examining any rate or charge which is applicable under this part to electric energy purchased by such public utility from any other public utility subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission; or

"(2) making a determination, for purposes of establishing the rates and charges for the resale of such electric energy to such consumers, not to take into account all or part of any such rate or charge which is in effect under this part.".

SEC. 3. SYSTEM FOR ALLOCATION OF COSTS AMONG PUBLIC UTILITY HOLDING COMPANY SYSTEMS.

Section 205 of the Federal Power Act is amended by adding the following new subsection at the end thereof:

"(g) STATE APPROVAL OF COST ALLOCATIONS AMONG PUBLIC UTILITY HOLDING COMPANY SYSTEMS.—(1) the Commission may not fix, or permit to take effect, any rate or charge under this Act applicable to the purchase of electric energy—

"(A) by any associate company of a public utility holding company system required to be registered under the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935,

"(B) from any other associate company of such system unless each State commission having ratemaking authority over sales to consumers of electric energy by the associate company referred to in subparagraph (A) has approved such rate or charge.

"(2) For purposes of this subsection, the terms 'holding-company system' and 'associate company' shall have the meanings provided by section 2 of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935.".

FIRST PACIFIC CAUCUS OF PARLIAMENTARIANS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BURTON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, I recently attended the First Pacific Caucus of Parliamentarians—Strengthening International Parliamentary Consultation on Atlantic and Pacific Issues. At the conference an excellent speech was delivered by Walter E. Hoadley, an American economist. While I do not agree with everything in the statement, I was greatly impressed with Mr. Hoadley's analysis of the Pacific region's economic status.

The text of his speech, entitled "World Economy and the Pacific Region" follows:

THE WORLD ECONOMY AND THE PACIFIC REGION

This is an historic gathering. Elected legislative officials from Atlantic and Pacific nations for the first time are meeting together. I commend the leaders of the Pacific Forum and The Atlantic Council of the United States for arranging these sessions in the interest of better global public understanding, economic improvement, and peace.

It is extremely difficult for most people to grasp much meaning in such broad concepts as the World economy or the Pacific Region. Unless we try to do so, however, we fail to realize our rising economic interdependence—opportunities and risks—with other peoples beyond our normal range of vision and contact.

I want to identify my biases at the outset. My perspective as an American economist reflects experience in the profit, private non-profit, and public sectors. I am sometimes known as a "crisis" forecaster. This is not because I favor or enjoy crises, but because long ago I came to realize that most very difficult public decisions are deferred and debated almost endlessly until a crisis forces action. Therefore, I often find it practical for policy-making purposes to pursue major problems mainly in terms of economic reality and the political urgency to resolve them.

It is my conviction that all sectors have to be involved to achieve effective enduring results. The key to real economic gains, in my opinion, lies in private profitable investments made in an encouraging governmental environment. General monetary, fiscal, and regulatory policies always will be vital in guiding the future course of the economy, but the initiative of entrepreneurs, especially at the local community level will be the ultimate source of sustainable economic growth.

The Pacific Region has become widely recognized in recent years as having greater economic promise, at least for the next several decades, than any other region in the world. Glowing reports and forecasts abound to support this very positive image.

Pacific prospects are indeed very encouraging, but no regional economy can prosper for long in isolation. The Pacific Region (excluding the U.S. and Canada) comprise roughly 20 percent of the world economy and, therefore, can hardly control its own destiny in global affairs. Nevertheless, the relatively "open" Asian economies should do well.

Research has established fairly clearly that a worldwide annual real growth rate of at least three to four percent is necessary to promote vigorous trade and development across nations. Whenever the growth rate falls below this minimum, as in 1981 and 1982, widespread global stagnation occurs and deepens in developing nations.

For perspective in pursuing our interregional discussions, it should be well noted that global unemployment increasingly threatens to reach crisis proportions over the years ahead. The worldwide unemployment rate now is probably 30 to 35 percent. Labor force estimates received at the recent Congress of the International Chamber of Commerce in Stockholm place the number of new jobs needed across the world by the end of the century as close to one billion. One third of these new jobs must be found in the Pacific Region, no easy task regardless of current relatively low prevailing unemployment rates.

Unless the world economic growth rate is well maintained and substantial new employment actually generated, the potential for national, regional, and global political, social, and economic instability can only increase.

My latest canvass of views of responsible economic forecasters and my own judgment indicate that near-term economic prospects are mixed, but positive. However, they provide no basis for complacency.

The world's total output is currently at an annual rate of about $13 trillion. In 1984, global real growth was roughly 4.5% and is projected to be 3.5% in 1985, mainly because growth will be slowing in the United States and Japan. Growth in the Pacific Region, which averaged 5.5% in 1984, also is expected to be slightly lower, around 5% in 1985.

The global inflation rate last year averaged close to 15 percent in 1984 and will drop to roughly 13 percent in 1985. This will be due mainly to projected lower fuel costs and continued weak agricultural and other commodity prices. The Pacific Region has long achieved a relatively low inflation rate, e.g. 4.5% in 1984, which seems likely to be maintained during the year ahead.

Inflation control, a major objective throughout most of the industrialized nations in recent years, has been pursued by tight monetary and constrained fiscal policies. As governments have competed with their private sectors for funds, higher interest rates have persisted and slowed economic growth.

The Pacific Region is by no means an economy of monolithic nations. Diversity is one of the region's greatest strengths and necessitates vigorous trade. Size and development pace vary considerably. Japan, of course, dominates the region, accounting for half of the total output. Japan is an obvious global economic tower of strength, but the so-called "Japan problem" persists. This concerns large trade surpluses, and long-standing reluctance to assume global political and capital responsibilities commensurate with economic achievements.

The People's Republic of China is now roughly one-fourth the economic size of Japan; Korea in turn is about one-fourth the size of the PRC; and Hong Kong is approximately one-third the size of the Korean economy.

The most dynamic job creating nations in the Asia/Pacific Region are Japan and the new industrial nations (i.e. NICS—Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Singapore). Canada, Australia, and New Zealand have moved away from old ties to the United Kingdom and expanded trade, but Australia and New Zealand are less competitive and have debt and fiscal deficit problems. The ASEAN countries (Brunei, Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines. Singapore, and Thailand) have achieved considerable economic progress individually and as a loosely knit economic group.

Financial clouds in the Pacific Region now hang heaviest over the Philippines, Indonesia, and Thailand for political and social as well as economic reasons.

In general, the Pacific nations reflect Asian cultures and are marked by above average savings, quality managements and products, and considerable adaptability to changing export markets and goods. With rising fears of protectionism overseas, many Pacific countries are now moving to give higher priority to expanding their own domestic demand, mobilizing savings for domestic investment, and seeking more foreign direct investment.

Entrepreneurship in a positive governmental climate repeatedly proves to be the strongest force for economic growth, jobs, and development. The United States has had 600,000 new businesses start during the past year in contrast to 70,000 in all of Western Europe with about the same population. No comparable data are available for the Pacific Region, but the number of new businesses clearly exceeds the European level. Venture capital has been abundant in the U.S. and liberal tax laws have added strong motivation.

Asian returnees from temporary Mid-East work assignments have demonstrated many distinct entrepreneurial tendencies as they have put their overseas earnings to work in business and farm ventures in their home lands.

A realistic appraisal of the outlook for the World and Pacific Regions focuses attention upon a number of developments with crisis potentials:

1. The global financial system seems to have weathered the worst of the developing nations' outstanding debt problems reasonably well. Restructuring loans to more realistic maturities and terms, falling interest rates, and expanding international trade have all assisted materially.

A major problem, however, remains. This concerns the steady drying up of new funds to developing nations in the Pacific and elsewhere. This may not be surprising in light of widespread public criticism of banks for lending overseas, loan losses, and new regulations limiting new credit extensions.

In addition, corporations paralleling the banks have become much more restrictive on advancing funds to foreign customers. As a result, it now frequently requires more cash or credit plus collateralized and documented procedures to complete overseas transactions than previously. Official lenders, e.g. World Bank and Regional Development Banks, do not have adequate funds to fill private sector deficiencies.

Accordingly, I can foresee a crisis 18–36 months ahead when a number of developing countries simply will run out of liquidity and funds to keep their economies moving forward. Past experience suggests that a 5 to 10 percent annual increase in external funding to LDC's is usually required to promote sufficient development to insure political and social stability. At present, the flow of new funds into the Third World is well below the traditional level.

High interest rates are always a deterrent to healthy economic growth. A decade ago, when the world was flooded with short-term funds from excessive monetary expansion, recycling of OPEC revenues, and sluggish private demand, interest rates were relatively low. Moreover, most borrowers paid about the same level of rates, reflecting the intense competition among lenders for loans.

More recently, after adverse loan collection experiences, lenders have readjusted upward rates to reintroduce differences in credit risks as well as industry and political risks. These developments account for the much higher prevailing basis level in interest rates than a decade ago, and probably foreshadow limited future declines in international lending rates to developing nations.

The U.S. dollar has appreciated more than 50 percent during the first half of the 1980's. Some correction to a lower value is to be expected on economic grounds. But, this is by no means exclusively a narrowly economic question of correcting adverse U.S. international trade and capital balances.

Put simply, the profit rate of return on U.S. dollar investments averages higher than on most others. Moreover, the return in the Asia/Pacific region is commonly well above that in Europe. When capital flight considerations to the U.S. dollar for safe political haven are added, it becomes clear that the value of the dollar is likely to remain rather high until such time as profitability and confidence in the U.S. begin to deteriorate. Also, vast technical and liquidity problems would have to be resolved to accommodate any possible massive flight from the U.S. dollar—as well as to which currency? So little immediate dollar value relief to developing nations to pay their bills is to be expected soon. The strong dollar, however, will continue to favor LDC sales of goods to U.S. buyers. The U.S. dollar will remain an economically treacherous currency and crisis prone for some considerable time ahead.

Leaders in a number of developing countries are now well aware that they cannot count nearly as much on new debts to finance development as in the past. They seem more willing to consider new foreign equity investments. This turn of events open an opportunity for some negotiations of enormous potential importance and should not be lost by inertia.

More private overseas investments cannot be expected to occur in volume until a clear-cut encouraging environment is assured. Very likely some entirely new guarantee or insurance mechanisms probably will be required. A few new good success stories of LDC-multinational corporate investments could spark a major wave of new development over the years ahead.

2. The most dynamic economies of the world and the Pacific Region consistently are marked by their vigorous pursuit of market-oriented economic policies. Some practical problems arise, however, as more and more market-oriented enterprises and nations face competition with others who don't follow the same principles. In theory, the superiority of market freedom and rewards should prevail and erase the issue. In the long run, this should be true. In practice, however, competition is real intense, with many government owned plants and companies around the world which ignore markets, costs, and profits, and simply produce and sell almost solely to preserve jobs. This is commonly seen by "market" organizations as uneconomic or unfair competition and provides a basis for serious protectionist sentiments. Better ways must be found to mesh the market and non-market systems or else trade wars may well erupt.

150 U.S. industries now have protectionist bills pending in the U.S. Congress.

3. International economic programs and policies hold little interest for most United States voters. Americans repeatedly demonstrate their desire to offer generous disaster assistance to the world's underprivileged, but have grave doubts about the wisdom of more U.S. funding of world official lending bodies or most foreign governments. Persistent sting'ing criticisms of the U.S. from abroad have reached the point where a majority of Americans now feel that no U.S. foreign economic policy or programs can please foreigners, or at least American money will be wasted or fall into unfriendly hands.

History warns that provincialism and protectionism reinforce emotional public anti-foreign feelings, cause resentment overseas and inevitable retaliation, and can lead to trade wars which always pose a threat of shooting wars.

More programs to demonstrate clearly and personally to Americans that our nation is growing increasingly interdependent with the rest of the world and the Pacific Region in particular are urgently needed. Overseas commentators would do well to be more sensitive to the practical negative consequences of their anti-American comments.

Americans, in turn, should note that our global leadership requires some special foreign policies and actions to win respect, but admiration should not always be expected. We cannot realistically hope as Americans to enjoy the benefits of world or regional leadership without incurring ongoing costs and responsibilities.

4. A delicate but critically important subject which is gradually getting more public attention concerns new massive migrations of people across borders in search of opportunity or safety. Included are large numbers of young graduates who refuse to return to their native lands after education in the U.S. or elsewhere. No easy solution is to be expected, but more open discussions among those involved are essential to try to ward off dangerous tensions and conflicts. Few nations are prepared politically or logistically to deal with the potential numbers involved.

5. Statistics are to be found at the root of most economic policy conflicts between nations. Too often economic statistics are used far too narrowly or precisely to prove or disprove a point. Frankly, our present global and national statistical systems have numerous shortcomings and need careful review and remedial action which will involve some expense. To ignore this matter is to invite more conflicts because of misinformation or lack of information. As an example, the "errors and omissions" item in the global payments statistics is now more than $100 billion which could suggest that at least some adverse international balances may reflect poor statistics as much or more as poor performance.

I make no appeal for a grand design of international economic strategy across the Pacific or with the Atlantic community. Rather, I sense a strong need for leaders and voters in both regions to become more aware of these and no doubt other looming crises as a first step in resolving them. At the outset, more emphasis needs to be placed on small problems or segments of larger ones which can be handled more readily and which give promise of successful resolution.

This first caucus of parliamentarians is an excellent start. The size and scope of the group give promise of fair and constructive consideration of pressing problems, careful identity of policy options, and a genuine willingness to go home and take some positive actions to prevent these looming crises from becoming real ones.●

TRIBUTE TO JOHN W. BYRNES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I take this time in conjunction with my colleague from the Eighth District of Wisconsin [Mr. ROTH] to pay honor to the memory of one of Wisconsin's most distinguished public citizens, a gentleman who served in this body for 28 years, John W. Byrnes.

John Byrnes died on January 12, last month. He was buried in Wisconsin, in Green Bay. Services were held in the cathedral on January 16. On January 19 the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], together with some of John Byrnes' very closest friends and former colleagues, Glenn Davis, Mel Laird, had a very special memorial service in a room in this Capitol honoring John Byrnes.

As a matter of fact, John Byrnes served the State of Wisconsin and this body longer than any other person save three: the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. O'Konski, who retired some years ago; the late Clem Zablocki of Wisconsin and Henry Cooper of Wisconsin. He not only served in this body but he served with very great distinction. For he was a leader and he was unusually gifted.

My own service corresponded with him for 14 years. The first 14 years that I served here, John Byrnes had served here his last 14 years. He, during this period of time, was the ranking minority member on the House Ways and Means Committee and was very well respected, not only in this body, but throughout the country for his leadership.

Earlier he was a founder in 1949 of the Chowder Marching Club which was an informal organization of House Republicans, notable, together with John Byrnes, in that closely knit group were Gerry Ford, Glenn Davis, Mel Laird, and Richard Nixon.

Later John Byrnes became the chair of the Republican Policy Committee from the period 1959 to 1965 and of course he served on the Joint Congressional Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation.

I must state that he can be characterized perhaps best by one of our former colleagues, Mel Laird, who said last month that John Byrnes was a "powerful, confident and convincing speaker to debate world issues with skill that was truly amazing. He was equally adept in helping the Eighth District constituents with their every personal concern and problem." Mel sometimes said that when he, Mel Laird, carried on at some length that, referring to himself "that when I got out of hand on the floor of the House on some national or international issue, John would point his finger at me and say, 'Mel, just remember, I served with your father in the Wisconsin State Senate,' " which indeed John Byrnes did from 1940 to 1944 immediately before he came here.

His hometown, Green Bay, a journalist recently said last month in summing up John Byrnes' appeal to the voters, he wrote that perhaps his real importance in public life in his era is that he has shown that a conservative can be respected and popular and cumulatively more successful at the ballot box if he combines a conservative inclination with intelligence and courage.

He indeed, John Byrnes, was popular at home and in this body. Indeed, John was a conservative. Indeed, he was an intelligent man and indeed, he served with very great courage.

So I am honored today to be here to remember John Byrnes, his kindnesses to me personally, his contributions to this body and also to say that we would like to be remembered to his widow, Barbara Byrnes and his six children, who will carry on for John in his absence.

Mr. Speaker, I yield at this time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ].

Mr. GONZALEZ. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise because it was my privilege when I came to the House in 1962 and was sworn in on January 10 to have been very kindly welcomed by Congressman John Byrnes. He was a very generous, warm-hearted individual. And even though he was a member of the other party and I was freshly arrived here after a special election, he took time to be very kind and very welcoming in his meeting and introducing himself to me and then later in subsequent years as we worked together in several sessions of the House.

I think that it would be remiss on my part to remain silent and not give testimony to the fact that regardless of what the political or governmental philosophies may have been that he was a very kind and a very effective and a very prominent Member of this body. He served honorably and with great distinction. Some of us recall his memory with a great deal of gratitude and friendship. I wish to go on record as expressing my sincere and deepest condolences to his next of kin and surviving members of his family.

Let the record show that, as Franklin Roosevelt often said, the sins of the warmhearted and the sins of the coldhearted are weighed on different scales, and that certainly whatever judgment would be rendered in the case of John Byrnes would be on the basis that he was a warmhearted human being

I thank the gentleman for having yielded.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I thank the gentleman from Texas for his recollections, which I think accord with many, many other Members, particularly on our side of the aisle, who were so generously and warmly treated by John Byrnes.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to John Byrnes' successor in the Eighth District, who now so nobly serves the Eighth District of Wisconsin [Mr. ROTH].

Mr. ROTH. I thank the dean of the Wisconsin delegation for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased and appreciative that the distinguished dean of the Wisconsin delegation [Mr. KASTENMEIER] is taking this special order so that we can pay tribute to a truly great man and certainly one of the real towers of this body.

John Byrnes represented the Eighth District of Wisconsin for 28 years, from 1945 to his retirement in 1973. Before coming to Congress, he served 4 years in the Wisconsin State Senate, where, at the age of 30, he was elected majority leader.

For 26 of the years John Byrnes was a Member of this body, he served on the Committee on Ways and Means, and was its ranking minority leader for many years. In addition, he served as chairman of the Republican Policy Committee from 1959 to 1965, and was chairman of the Wisconsin delegation for many years.

Many people will recall that period of time as the era of Wilbur Mills, who chaired the Ways and Means Committee. But the Ways and Means Committee was by no means a one-man show during that period. The monumental tax, Social Security health and trade legislation of that era bears the indelible stamp of John W. Byrnes.

Mastery of the art of constructive compromise is a key to success in this body, and it was the ability of John Byrnes to work effectively with Chairman Mills that not only gave him influence but also made the enactment of certain landmark legislation possible.

In a 1970 book on the Ways and Means Committee, John Manley wrote that "Mills and Byrnes together, not just Mills alone, are responsible for the way the committee goes about its business. Far from being cut off from influence in the committee, the Republicans feel that because of Mills and Byrnes they have as much say if not more than the Democrats."

I have even heard it said that if you wanted to know how a particular Ways and Means measure would fare, the real clue was what John Byrnes thought about it.

The Customs Simplification Act of 1954, the 1954 Internal Revenue Code reform, the Kerr-Mills Health Care Act and the Medicare Act of 1965 all bear John Byrnes' imprint.

John Byrnes accomplished what he did because of his towering intellect, an unceasing commitment to certain deeply held principles, and common sense.

Congressman Byrnes was considered to be one of the brightest Members of this body, something which was evident during committee deliberation and debates on the House floor.

But behind this intellect was something more—a commitment to his principles. He was guided by the belief that the resources and responsibilities of the Federal Government were not infinite. He continually attempted to persuade his colleagues that Congress should limit the growth of Federal spending and reduce the national debt. He stood by those principles, even if they placed him in the small minority—and they did on more than one occasion.

Today especially, as we receive the new budget, we should remember John Byrnes as a man who cared deeply about the taxpayer's dollar—a man who believed that if tax dollars were to be spent, they should be spent wisely and well.

John Byrnes was a contemporary and friend of the major political figures of the past generations, including his House contemporaries Gerald Ford and Richard Nixon. He was, in fact the founder of the Republicans' Chowder and Marching Club to which these two future Presidents belonged. The group also included a future Secretary of Defense, fellow Wisconsinite Mel Laird.

In later years he was a mentor and friend of then-Congressman George Bush and Barber Conable, who carried on the Byrnes legacy on the Ways and Means Committee.

John Byrnes achieved a national political prominence almost unparalleled in the history of Wisconsin. He was a friend and adviser to Presidents. He was a true giant in the House of Representatives, who left his mark on some of the most important legislation of our lifetime. He was considered for the Vice Presidential nomination in 1960. He was Wisconsin's favorite son candidate for President in 1964. When he left Congress in 1973 he could have, had he desired, served in the Cabinet.

But beyond the national attention he deservedly received, he was above all a true Representative of the people. He never forgot his roots in the Green Bay community. That made him all the more effective as a Congressman.

In 1960, when John Byrnes was being considered for his party's Vice Presidential nomination, a journalist said this about his appeal to the voters:

> Perhaps his real importance in the public life of this era is that he has shown that a conservative can be respected, and popular, and cumulatively more successful at the ballot box, if he combines a conservative inclination with intelligence and courage.

From time to time there are individuals who serve in this body who truly stand out—whose achievements will be honored for generations to come. John Byrnes, through his intellect, his courage, and his commitment to people, was one such individual. The standards he set through almost three decades of service to Wisconsin and the Nation are those we should all try and emulate.

I want to extend to John's wife, Barbara, and their six children my deepest sympathy. Their loss is our loss as well.

I am also pleased to insert a personal statement by Vice President BUSH, a former Ways and Means Committee colleague and friend of former Congressman Byrnes, and an article from the Milwaukee Journal of January 20, 1985:

FEBRUARY 4, 1985.

As a former colleague of Johnny Byrnes and as one who served with him on the Committee on Ways and Means, I want to join in this tribute to him.

What a man he was. Knowledgeable, principled, and bright—he set an example of excellence that is hard to match. He just knew more about taxes and social security than most in Congress. He and Wilbur Mills, one a Democrat, one a Republican, dominated the Ways and Means Committee. They did it not through throwing their seniority around, but by studying, learning, and in the final analysis, teaching.

John Byrnes, a super human being—we will miss him very, very much.

Sincerely, GEORGE BUSH.

BYRNES STOOD FAST AGAINST GOVERNMENT'S DEFICIT SPENDING

(By John W. Kote)

WASHINGTON, DC—John W. Byrnes was a loyal Republican, but he did not cave in to party leaders when he disagreed on a fundamental principle. He was a traditional conservative, and friends say he was appalled by the record federal deficits of $200 billion or more being projected.

Byrnes, 71, who represented Wisconsin's 8th Congressional District for 28 years in the House, died of a stroke last weekend. In 1972, Byrnes took the unusual step of announcing that he would not run for re-election, although he was only 59.

He had been in the minority for all but four of his years in Congress. For many of those years, he was the top Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, which has responsibility for tax, trade and Social Security bills.

Byrnes and other Republican leaders made a lot of noise about the deficits in the 1960s under Democratic Presidents John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson, particularly over what was then the post-World War II record of $25.2 billion in fiscal 1968. They argued that Johnson should have raised taxes during prosperous times to finance U.S. efforts in the Vietnam War and expanded domestic and social programs.

NO REVENUE TO SHARE

But when Republican President Richard M. Nixon, a good friend, started pushing various spending buttons in his first term to aid his 1972 re-election campaign, Byrnes rebelled. One notion pushed by Nixon with support from many Republicans was general revenue sharing with state and local governments. Byrnes thought that was ridiculous in the face of continuing deficits.

"We must recognize that there is no revenue to share," Byrnes said in March 1971. "The only thing the federal government has to share today is debt."

Byrnes felt strongly that the Nixon plan had a basic defect—it placed the burden of collecting taxes on elected federal officials, but allowed mayors and governors to spend the money.

"People who spend the money should be accountable to the taxpayer," Byrnes said. "There should be some connection between the spending of funds and the onus of collecting them."

For years, Byrnes and the longtime Ways and Means chairman, former Rep. Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.), ran the committee with iron hands. Because both were fiscal conservatives, they had few disputes. But Mills got the presidential bug and switched on revenue sharing, which had lots of support from state and local officials. In October, 1972, a five-year, $30 billion revenue-sharing bill sailed through the House and Senate.

In the House, there were only 33 Republican votes against it, two of which came from Byrnes and former Wisconsin Rep. Glenn Davis, a friend of Byrnes for more than 40 years. There were, by the way, three Democratic votes against it from Wisconsin: from Rep. David Obey, Sen. William Proxmire and then Sen. Gaylord Nelson.

Davis, who served in the House from 1947 to 1957 and again from 1965 to 1975, continued to see Byrnes regularly during the last decade. Their homes were only a mile apart in Arlington, Va., a Washington suburb. Byrnes took a job with the Washington office of Milwaukee's Foley & Lardner, Wisconsin's largest law firm, using his expertise in tax law to advise top clients.

In an interview, Davis said that Byrnes was disturbed by the supply-side economics of President Reagan's administration and the theory that no tax increases were necessary to help narrow the record deficits.

"We commiserated about the supply-side theories," Davis said. "He just could not accept the fact that the economy would expand to the point where we would not have a deficit."

That, of course, is the theory pushed by Sen. Robert W. Kasten (R-Wis.) and others who fashioned the 1984 Republican platform, which demanded that taxes not increase and advocated more tax cuts to stimulate the economy.

FRIENDSHIP WITH LAIRD

Another close friend was former Defense Secretary Melvin Laird, who served with Byrnes in the Wisconsin House delegation from 1953 through 1968 before joining Nixon's first cabinet. Laird recalled that Byrnes had a favorite way of putting him down.

"Mel, you don't know what you're talking about," Byrnes would say, shaking his finger in Laird's face. "For God's sake, I served in the State Senate with your father."

That is true. Byrnes arrived in Madison from Green Bay to take his seat in 1941 at the tender age of 27, the same year that Laird's father, a retired Presbyterian minister, took office. Four years later, Byrnes was in the US House.

Byrnes was in the forefront of the campaign that led to a sweeping tax reform bill in 1969, which narrowed some of the many loopholes in the internal revenue code. But he was always uncomfortable with government social programs.

"Government at its costliest can only nibble at the edges of human and social problems," he once said. "The only way these problems can be solved is by the people themselves working with the initiative and energy which comes from drive and incentive."

To avoid a fight between Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater, the eventual 1964 GOP presidential nominee, and then New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, Laird came up with Byrnes as Wisconsin's favorite son candidate. Laird calls Byrnes "the most reluctant presidential candidate in history." But he got Wisconsin's 30 votes at the Republican convention in San Francisco.

"You're a hell of a campaign manager, Byrnes kidded Laird. "I don't have a single bumper sticker."

Mr. ROTH. I thank the dean of our delegation, Mr. KASTENMEIER, for taking this time, for his graciousness and for his generosity in yielding some of his time to me.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I compliment my colleague on his eloquent remarks.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the reason I take this moment is because we had a very special beautiful memorial service here in the Capitol the day before inauguration day in room 227. Mr. Glenn Davis of Wisconsin, a former Member, led off the memorial service, which was participated in by our good Chaplain, Dr. James Ford, and joining me in eulogies to our dear friend, John Byrnes, were our former Member and Defense Secretary, Congressman Mel Laird, and Bill Gage, who was John Byrnes' administrative aide and knew him from grade school days on until the day he left this Congress and also attended his funeral. And then the memorial service was concluded with remarks by John's senior son, John Robert Byrnes.

Mr. Speaker, I taped the recorded service, and I ask unanimous consent that those comments appear in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

MEMORIAL SERVICE OF JOHN BYRNES, JANUARY 19, 1985

Mr. GLENN DAVIS. The family, Bobbie, Barbara, Bonnie, Mike, Charlie, Betsy, John, minus only two grandchildren which were John's pride and joy and their mother who is with them in Madison. The friends, workmates and playmates of John William Byrnes, June 12, 1913 to January 12, 1985.

We are met in commiseration to share grief and sorrow, We are met in reconciliation and acceptance and a few cherished moments of recollections of this man.

John devoted twenty-eight years, and I think the word devoted is exactly correct, twenty-eight of those seventy-one years to the House of Representatives. It is most appropriate that the words of the scripture have been selected by and be presented by the Chaplain of the House of Representatives, The Reverand Dr. James Ford.

Dr. FORD. As you know the psalms are part of our religious traditions from whatever background we know. I want to read from the psalms today which express the comfort and the hope and the joy that we can know by the fact that God is in charge of our lives in this world.

The first is psalm 139, and it suggests where ever we are, God is with us and his spirit follows us. I always feel when I read this psalm the bond between the living and the dead and between all of us. The second is the familiar 23.

PSALM 139

O Lord, thus hast searched me, and known me.

Thou knowest my downsitting and mine uprising, thou understandest my thought afar off.

Thou compassest my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways.

For there is not a word in my tongue, but, lo, O Lord, thou knowest it altogether.

Thou has beset me behind and before, and laid thine hand upon me.

Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it.

Whither shall I go from thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence?

If I ascend up into heaven, thou are there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there.

If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea;

Even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me.

If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover; even the night shall be light about me.

Yea, the darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to thee.

Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me, and know my thoughts:

And see if there by any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.

PSALM 23

The Lord is my shepherd: I shall not want.

He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters.

He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his Name's sake.

Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.

Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil, my cup runneth over.

Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the LORD for ever.

Let us pray. Almighty God we give thanks this day for the life and work of John Byrnes. We offer our praise and thanksgiving for his commitment to our nation and his deeds of service to this community.

Bless we pray his family, to keep them in your grace. May they be substained by the knowledge of your presence and your abounding spirit and your love to us all.

Now let us pray together.

Our Father who art in heaven, Hollowed be thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread; And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive these who trespass against us; And lead us not into temptation, But deliver us from evil. For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

Mr. GLENN DAVIS. A few words now from a great friend, fellow member of Burning Tree former Secretary of the Chowder & Marching Society, the Former Whip, and the present Republican Leader in the House, the Honorable Robert Michel.

Mr. MICHEL. It is very appropriate that we should have this memorial service in this room where the portraits hang of distinguished Republicans who served with John during his tenure here in the Congress, Joe Martin Charlie Halleck, Les Arends, Jerry Ford and John Rhodes.

John Byrnes, now there was beautiful person to remember, both as a former Colleague of some of us in the Congress, but all the more so as a dear personal friend to all of us.

For those of us who never would have known John except for the quirk of fate that brought us together in the political arena, we want it to be known that our lives were all enriched simply by our association with him.

His was always a class act professionally. He gave real meaning to the expression that politics can be a very noble profession.

When John retired from the Congress after 28 years, Jerry Ford, who was then our Leader in the House, said:

"John Byrnes . . ., has been one of the great legislators of our time. Formidable in debate, unequalled in conference and universally respected for his integrity and intelligence. He has left a lasting imprint on the fiscal policies of the postwar period."

An editorial in the Washington Evening Star commenting on John's retirement said in part:

"The popular image of the Ways and Means Committee wholly dominated by Wilbur Mills is false. It has been more a tandem operation.

Mills and Byrnes, two seasoned, energetic pros working together over the years to shape an enormous amount of legislation on taxes, international trade, social security, health, welfare, and lately revenue sharing.

One Committee member summed it up rather neatly: "The two together are eighty percent of the Committee. Forty percent will be missing when John is gone."

Continuing on, the editorial said:

"Byrnes personifies so many of the qualities a Congressman should have. He is immensely hard-working and knowledgable, tough-minded yet compassionate where the problems of the average citizen are at stake.

And he has been a thoroughly independent thinker, willing to depart from GOP orthodoxy as he did to support the Administration's family assistance plan or to refuse as he did to support Mr. Nixon's revenue sharing concept.

. . . The Committee, the House and the public interest all will feel the loss when he is gone."

There was indeed a void in the House when John retired and now his passing leaves a void in each of our lives.

Chowder and Marching won't be quite the same with out John's hearty laugh about our picayunish problems that he no longer had to worry about.

I am personally going to miss sitting in on the friendly poker games that John enjoyed so much with the likes of former members Ben Guill, Tex., Don Jackson, Calif., and Charlie Potter of Michigan.

His gin rummy game wasn't all that good out at Burning Tree, but there was no more competitive golfer in the club. I loved him as a partner, not only for his handicap, but because he inspired me with his grit and determination.

And finally, I guess I'll never forget the times Corinne and I have been privileged to be in the company of mutual friends to see John put on that apron and cook for the lot of us on that charcoal grill. He was always a delight to be with.

To Bobbie and members of the family: We know how devoted John was to his family. We'd like to be as helpful as we can during this difficult time and just wanted you to know that Johnny was something extra special to us.

We loved him dearly, just as you did.

Mr. GLENN DAVIS. I think Mr. Leader, since you have mentioned the part he played on the Ways and Means Committee and the tandem of which he was a part, I think his family will be gratified to know that the other half of that tandem and the great former Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Wilbur Mills is with us here today.

The man that made John Byrnes his idle and in his own right became a great minority leader of the Ways and Means Committee, Barber Conable is also here with us today.

Twenty-nine years ago this spring, three Wisconsin Congressmen were sitting having breakfast in Madison Wisconsin where we could see the state Capitol out of the window and the junior member of that trio began to talk with enthusiasm about his adventures as a member of the State Senate and after it had reached a maximum degree of thickness the senior member of that trio turned to him and said For goodness sake Melvy I served in the State Senate with your father. That ended that particular recitation but he was a particularly bouyant young fellow and he continued to serve in the House of Representatives with John for sixteen years.

From adjoining districts the only real thrash point of that service was the manner in which they vied with each other with respect to the 186 Menominee Indians who resided on the border between their two districts.

After that sixteen years of joint service this colleague became the Secretary of Defense, John's former colleague Mel Laird.

Mr. LAIRD. Bobbie, members of the family. I had the opportunity to be in Green Bay on Tuesday in that beautiful Cathedral for the mass and for the services that were conducted for our friend John.

I see so many people here today from the Congress, and Chowder and Marching. I see Bobbie's friends from the Red Cross. I see our friends from Burning Tree. I see members of the Wisconsin Congressional Delegation.

We are all John's friends whether it be in the Congress from Wisconsin or Burning Tree. We love him.

We also remember his lack of pretense, his loyalty to his friends, his warmth, compassion and commonsense. His very special qualities as a person. He loved us all very much. He loved Barbara most of all and those six children and the two grandchildren.

No run-of-the-mill Congressman was he. For four years he represented the Green Bay area of Wisconsin as their state senator and as Glenn Davis has pointed out he had served fourteen terms here in the House of Representatives with great distinction.

He was recognized as Wisconsin's most outstanding Congressman in the entire history of our state.

He was truly Wisconsin's favorite son. In 1964, all of Wisconsin's thirty delegates at the convention in San Francisco cast their ballots for John Byrnes as Wisconsin's favorite for President.

More legislation in the field of taxation, trade finance, and social programs bears his imprint and name than any other member of the House of Representatives in the past fifty years. He brought to his duties a fine intelligence, a deep interest in broad national and international issues.

He always had an abiding concern for the every day needs of his constituents. He served as ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee and Chairman of the House Republican Policy Committee. He participated in the most far reaching Congressional decisions of our time. A powerful, competent, and convincing speaker that could debate global issues with skill and certitude in committee or on the House floor that was truly amazing. He was equally adept in helping eighth district constituents with their every personal concern and problem.

At the service in Green Bay, I read a little poem that was included in a card I received at the time of my mother's death some two years ago. I would like to share it with you today.

"Do not stand at my grave and weep,
I am not there, I do not sleep.
I am a thousand winds that blow,
I am the diamond glints of snow,
I am the sunlight on ripened grain,
I am the gentle autumn rain
When you awaken in the morning's hush,
I am the swift uplifting rush of quiet birds in circled flight.
I am the soft star that shines at night.
Do not stand at my grave and cry,
I am not there, I did not die."

Mr. GLENN DAVIS. There is one man here with us this morning who probably knew John Byrnes longer than anyone else. He knew him in Green Bay. He came to Washington with him and he was his good right hand through all of his years in the House of Representatives. His friend and Administrative Assistant, Bill Gage.

Mr. BILL GAGE. It is true I knew John Byrnes for a long time. In fact I can't remember when I didn't know John Byrnes. I know we were together in our first grade class, I have a picture to verify that.

That incidently was back in the first years of the Harding administration. We probably have known each other even before that. My mother use to tell me that she and John's mother use to take walks together pushing our baby carriages.

From first grade and until John retired from Congress, we were never very far apart. Grade school, high school, college, twenty-eight years in the House.

We were very close. We worked together, we played together, even on various occasions we lived together. I even met my wife through John. She was his date at the time. I was there during John's courtship of Bobbie, at least part of the time. I once made the supreme sacrifice of accompaning John on the weekend to see Bobbie in New Jersey.

We got married about the same time, and our first children were born in the hospital a week apart. As that was about to happen I will never forget, I was suddenly called to Green Bay because of a death in the family and I left my wife in John's care. Putting him in charge of the feeding, transporting if necessary of not one but two alarmingly overdue women. It was an assignment that would have reduced me to a state of terror.

John not only accepted it willingly, but he performed it capably and with good cheer. These distinguished gentlemen have told you of John's accomplishments, to me that was his finest hour.

What can you say about this friend, this companion, this brother who who is now gone. What can you say about a woman who was so close for so long.

Well I can testify by close observation that we all know John was a good man, he was an honest man, a man of courage and a man of integrity. For those virtues and what he accomplished he will long be remembered.

I will keep two memories. I will always remember the faithfulness and the utter dependability of his friendship. I will never forget John's capacity for bringing happiness to everyone around him. His zest for life. His genuine affection for people. His unfailing sense of humor when facing up to the good things in life and the bad.

To put it simply John Byrnes brought joy into our lives. For that in our thoughts and our hearts he will never be forgotten.

Mr. GLENN DAVIS. John Byrnes gave not only a great heritage, he gave his name to his oldest son. The United States Attorney for the western district of Wisconsin, John Robert Byrnes.

Mr. JOHN ROBERT BYRNES. Dad was a remarkable public man. Not only for his accomplishments in public office, but for the quality of character he brought to both his public and private life.

He loved his country. This guiding principle motivated him throughout his public life. He deeply respected the traditions of the Congress and the democratic principles represented by this Capitol.

He had all his respect and affection for the people in Wisconsin who sent him to Congress for twenty-eight years. He was truly a servant of the public.

It is fitting to commemorate his life at this time of Inauguration when all Americans hope for the selfless, honest leadership that he exemplified.

Like all public men, he was also a private man. He reluctantly made the sacrifice of time with his family that is demanded by public men. There were times when it was impossible for him to leave the responsibility and stress of public duties outside the front door. But even with those sacrifices, he was a loving and caring husband and father. He was a true and loving partner in marriage to my mother for almost thirty-eight years.

He had strong values and high standards. He knew what was right and what was wrong. He taught it to his children. He shared our joys and sorrows. Like all fathers he took pride in our accomplishments. He bore frustrations at our occasional weaknesses. But not always in silence.

He was guided in his private life by love for his family, with the same intensity the love for his country guided his public life.

We all loved him and will miss him. Even though he is gone his love for us and the example of his life will stay with us for the rest of out lives.

My mother and brother and sisters and I all want to thank you for the love and respect and affection you showed Dad and us, both during his life and today.

Mr. GLENN DAVIS. When John Byrnes came to the state senate in 1941, across the street from the Capitol, presiding as Speaker of the Assembly was the man who served later as Attorney General and Governor of the State and then became one on John's colleagues in the House for fourteen years. We had hoped Governor Thompson could have come and shared in this but he is just not strong enough to come to this ceremony. But I know he wanted so very much to do so.

So as we approach the end of this ceremony, we hope, members of John's family, that it has not brought grief or sorrow, that it has helped to bring a few cherished moments of memories to this good and dear man.

BENEDICTION

Dr. FORD. Let us pray. O God, who healest the broken in heart, and bindest up their wounds: Look in tender pity and compassion upon thy servants whose joy has been turned into mourning. Leave them not comfortless, but grant that they may be drawn closer to thee and to one another by their common sorrow. Fill their souls with the light and comfort of thy presence. Grant unto them such a vision of that life wherein all mysteries shall be revealed, and all tears be wiped away, that they may be able to endure as seeing thee who art invisible. So dwell with them and be their God, until the day break and the shadows flee away. The Lord bless you and keep you, The Lord make his face shine upon you, and be gracious unto you, The Lord lift up his countenance upon you and give peace. Amen.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the life, character and public service of the late Honorable John W. Byrnes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON THE BUDGET

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, it was with great interest that a few minutes ago I listened to the President's message on the budget. As I listened to it, I thought that if I had a wish that I would wish that every American citizen who is concerned about the plight, the economic plight of this Nation, could sit back and listen, as I did, to the words that were read here in this Chamber today that were sent by the President of the United States. To do so and to not think about the conditions that exist economically in this country today would lead one to the inevitable and inexorable conclusion that all is well on the economic front in America today.

Essentially, if you are to look at the President's budget, you would do so as we look at all of our budgets; our personal budget, the budget that we use in conducting the affairs of our business or our farms, and we must deal with them in two parts: one, we deal with the income side, and the other, the expense side.

When you think about what the President has sent to Congress and to the American people, he actually deals with one-half of the budget problem. He ignores the income, the revenues, and deals with the outlays, the expenses. He ignores the need for tax reform to close those enormous gigantic loopholes that are used by the wealthy and the powerful in this country to avoid paying taxes, and deals entirely, almost entirely, with the expense side, the outlay side of the budget.

So he has sent to the American people half a budget, during which he tells us how he wants to increase military expenses, and he will later show us how he wants to increase foreign aid outlays. On the other side, he wants to reduce the outlays for domestic programs, those things that deal with more directly the American people.

Mr. Speaker, my concern in taking this special order on the budget today, offered by Mr. Reagan and by the Republican Party, I believe is best illustrated by the comments made to me by a young, concerned American constituent from my congressional district. Last fall, during the Presidential elections, after giving a campaign speech for my candidate, who was not elected, I was approached by this young man who asked to speak to me about the Presidential election. He personally did not think that Mr. Reagan was deserving of a second term, but added, "Congressman, frankly, it seems to me that the economy is improving so well it must mean that the administration's policies are really working." This is the message that Mr. Reagan has sent to this young man; it is the one that he heard and it was the one that he believed. I do not know how he voted, but a majority of the American people heard this message. They believe it, and they reelected Mr. Reagan.

Mr. Speaker, there is a famous parable that is told over and over again each year and throughout thousands of years that is written in the Bible called the "Sower and the Seed." One part of the story described the seed that fell upon good soil which, when nourished, grows into a healthy plant that produces fruit and food for the people.

However, the parable goes on to report that weeds grow up alongside this healthy plant, and eventually also flourish, and after they are nourished, choke off this plant as they overcome it in time. I commended this story to the young constituent and to all those who believe the Republican economic policies are producing a truly sound recovery, and a stable economic future.

Today, the headlines in the local newspapers read, "Reagan Promises New Budget." However, the real story today is that Mr. Reagan has promised yet another staggering deficit. Not much said about the deficit, a deficit which will add another $200 billion this next fiscal year to the national debt. Need I remind the American people that in 4 short years these Republican policies have doubled the national debt. I was asked not too long ago if the deficit mattered any longer. My reply was, "Only during Democratic administrations; obviously, the deficits do not apply during the Republican administrations."

By 1989, according to the budget that was submitted here today, the debt will have tripled under Mr. Reagan's policies. While our economy appears to have all the signs of a blossoming recovery promised permanent in nature by the President's words today, the fact is that the weeds of the deficit are spreading and growing nearby the recovery, and that all signs indicate that they are reaching out to choke off our future and the future of our children throughout generations to come.

In 1989, when Mr. Reagan leaves office, the the Congressional Budget Office reports that nearly one-half of all taxes paid by the American people under the present system will go simply to paying interest on the national debt. Let me say that again: By 1989, the Congressional Budget Office reports that if nothing is changed, if Mr. Reagan's policies persist without any change, that by 1989 one-half of all taxes paid by the American people will go toward the payment of interest on the national debt. Yet, Mr. Reagan says do not worry, everything is all right. We have a permanent recovery; take your eye off the ball, American people, do not look at the deficits because we have here an economic recovery.

Mr. Speaker, last fall, when many of us tried to warn the voters that deficit spreading was beyond the reasonable limit, Mr. Reagan said, we were an antiprosperity party; that we were throwing cold water upon his success, and that we would keep our hands off his recovery. He managed to convince the American people, in his words, that the "Democrats are reckless spenders." He said just a few short weeks ago, during his second inaugural address, "The reason we have this enormous deficit is because of a runaway Congress that has recklessly appropriated funds beyond what the President has proposed for over 50 years, leading us down into the cravasse of deficit and debt."

I challenged the President's statement, and in fact, over the last 40 years the bipartisan, nonpartisan, nonpolitical Appropriation Committee reports, and I have the data, and I will include it as a part of my remarks today, that out of the last 40 years, Congress has appropriated more than requested by the President only three times out of the last 40 years. Thirty-seven of those years we appropriated less than requested by the President, but the "Great Communicator" is able to sell the American people on the opposite of those facts, and unfortunately, they bought it, hook, line, and sinker.

Mr. Reagan was wrong; there is no one in this House or in the other body across the Capitol who wants to see our economy fail. Everyone of us in this body, every Member of Congress wants America to succeed. We want to see our economic growth; we want a strong and vibrant economy.

There is no one who wants a stronger and more vibrant economy than the gentleman from Texas, our majority leader, who will be here in a few minutes to respond to the President's deficit.

We do not believe that a recovery fueled by the Government's borrowing of $200 billion a year will lead ultimately to a stable, healthy economy. You cannot borrow yourself into a status of wealth, no matter how much you wish it to be true. The seeds of deficit spreading, planted by Mr. Reagan and his Republican allies, are seeds of future economic chaos, and while we are basking in the sunlight of a current economic recovery which is temporary, we are living on borrowed time.

The Democratic Party knows and the American people know that a true recovery, one that is sound and ongoing, must be based on real money, not on borrowed time. For those in this body who believe the Republicans when they say that deficits do not matter, I suggest you try their approach to deficit spending on your own personal finances. Your creditors will not be so generous as the American people have demonstrated their generosity in reelecting Mr. Reagan to a second term.

Imagine now what would happen if you went out and borrowed all the money that you could, you borrowed up to your credit limit on each credit card that you carry in your purse or your billfold, you financed your home, you refinanced your car, your household personal possessions. Then you went to your banker and said, "Oh, what the heck, I would like to borrow as much as you will let me have again, over and above what you have already lent me."

What do you expect that he would say? Go to your in-laws: go to your children, go to your relatives around the country and cosign a note, because your credit and your collateral has been exhausted.

What then would happen? I would say that you would be living pretty well, pretty well for a while, that is; but that you would have to start paying your bills when the banker would not extend your credit any longer. Somehow you would have to figure out a way to pay back all the money that you had borrowed, unless of course you went to your attorney and filed for personal bankruptcy.

The annual Federal deficit, which is simply added each year to the cumulative Federal debt, works the same way. During the elections the Republicans told us we could borrow and spend our way into economy prosperity. That is what they have done for the past 4 years—borrow and spend, borrow and spend, borrow and spend. They will reply that, of course, the Democrats tax and spend. Of course, you need revenues in order to prevent borrowing.

So what do you want, my fellow Americans: A huge deficit which looms like dark clouds on the horizon portending a dim future for your children and your grandchildren, or do you wish to come to grips with the Federal budget, the same as we are required to come to grips with our own personal finances and the way we have to manage our own business affairs if we want to continue in the business and to maintain our good credit and our good standing in the community where we live.

That is what we have done for the past 4 years—borrow and spend. But where will they be when the bills come due? Where will they be when someone has to get up before this Chamber some day and take responsibility for these policies. So far, Mr. Reagan has run from the consequences. He has produced a fine television presence before the American people. He has convinced them that deficits do not matter.

But when, oh when, and who will come forth among those who represent his administration and take credit for what they have done to the American people and the financial structure in this Nation.

Actually, Ronald Reagan is not a conservative on economic policy. Ronald Reagan is the most fiscally irresponsible President ever to serve in the White House as President of the United States, and history will prove it some day when the pigeons come home to roost.

Where are those today who are fiscally responsible on the other side of the aisle? Why is it that the Republican Party is not here to defend the $200 billion deficit that they say does not matter? On previous occasions, my colleagues on the other side of the aisle, the Republican Party, have come forward and asked, "Who among the Democrats will answer the questions that we are posing today?"

I am returning the favor. I am asking, where are the Republicans? Where are those who defend the President's policies? Where are they that would come forth and defend the $200 billion deficit that he is handing to the American people?

We can all see in this Chamber that there is no one here to defend the President, and I would conclude that his budget, even among his own Representatives in his own party, is dead on arrival because there is no one here to defend it.

In 1981, when they wanted to reward their wealthy friends with a series of tax cuts, I am told that there is a whole tax-cut culture that had developed in the last 4 years among those people who are manipulating the Tax Code in such a way as to avoid paying their own fair share of the taxes that all working people in this country must pay each week when they receive their paychecks.

But in 1981, when they wanted to reward these friends with all of these tax cuts, how did they propose to make up for the lost revenue? If you look at the scale, while the deficit has increased enormously over the past 4 years, also the revenues have decreased as well because of the enormous, outrageous tax cuts that the President has given to his friends on Wall Street and among the rich sections of this country.

Borrow, borrow, borrow is what we have done with this administration's economic policy, and they continue to borrow, continue the cost of that tax cut. The cost of that tax cut in 1981 was $750 billion, which contributed to the red ink which is demonstrated and illustrated here on this chart today. $750 billion they borrowed purely on the good faith and credit of the American people. The one question they never answered, and the President has not addressed and continues to avoid in his new budget is: Who will pay? Who will pay this deficit that Mr. Reagan has presented to the American people?

Mr. Speaker, let me now take a moment to turn to the specifics of the budget that Mr. Reagan has presented to us and the Republicans want us to adopt in this Chamber.

But before I do, I would like to yield to my colleague, the majority leader of the House of Representatives, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT], so that he may use whatever time he may desire in order to address this question of the President's budget.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for yielding, and I appreciate his taking the time today to discuss this very vital subject.

There are several myths that have been perpetrated, no doubt innocently, by people in the White House and within the administration. In his inaugural speech President Reagan was guilty of one of these myths, in which he said that 50 years of deficit financing have finally caught up with us. Well, a mere reference to the chart reveals that it is not 50 years of deficit financing that have finally caught up with us, it is 4 years of Mr. Reagan's own policies.

More has been added to the deficit in those 4 years than was added in all the cumulative 46 previous years. So if you go back 50 years, including even Mr. Roosevelt's three terms and 1 year, during which time we fought a war and defended the freedoms of this country, we discover that all those Presidents combined did not add as much to the deficit as Mr. Reagan did in one term.

About 1 year ago today the national debt reached a level of $1 trillion. That is not correct. I should have said, about 4 years ago this month, at about the beginning of Mr. Reagan's first term, and that, of course, was the result of the cumulative effect of 192 years, from George Washington through Jimmy Carter. But this year, before this year is out, in 1985, because of Mr. Reagan's policies, the national debt will reach $2 trillion. More will have been added to the national debt in 5 years of Mr. Reagan's administration than was added in the entirety of the previous 192 years of our constitutional history.

A second point that I think really needs clarification is that the President was quoted in the Washington Post of Sunday, January 27, as having said in an interview with radio broadcasters, that the huge rise in deficits during his administration was the responsibility of the Congress, so that the Congress is the one to blame for these huge increases during his administration. He went on to say, as he was quoted, at least in this news story, that every year since he has been in the White House the budget deficit he has sent to the Congress was lower than the Congress would accept. That just is not a true statement. That is an inaccurate statement.

Last year I recall very clearly that the House passed in April our congressional budget resolution. That resolution reduced by $181 billion over the next 3 years the deficits that Mr. Reagan had asked for. Now, if he meant by use of the word, "budgets," appropriations, the same would be the case.

Last year the President asked for the spending in our regular appropriation bills of some $568 billion. Congress appropriated instead $551 billion, or $17 billion less for this current fiscal year in the appropriations than Mr. Reagan had asked for.

I suppose these things really need to be made a part of the record so that myths do not become ingrained in the public's consciousness. I understand that the President is going to go out and talk with the American people, promoting his budget. That is his right, it is his privilege, and I think it is his responsibility. I hope that he shows them exactly what he proposes to cut because it is the American people who are affected.

To me it seems grossly unfair to suggest that we require working Americans to pay taxes on their health insurance, and that we require medicare patients to pay higher hospital bills for their needed medical treatment at a time when certain multi-billion dollar corporations got by last year without paying any income tax at all. That just seems to me manifestly unfair.

So we will come to grips with this budget recommendation. We will alter it, we will amend it, we will rearrange some of the priorities. I hope and trust we will be more responsive to the wishes of the American people, and that we will balance our set of priorities in a sensible, sane way. But when it is all said and done, we do really need to reduce these deficits because it simply is not fair for us to go on a credit-card binge, taking some 19 percent of the gross national product annually in taxes and spending some 25-percent annually and just putting the rest of it on the bill of our children who someday will have to pay for things that we will have used up and worn out long before they ever reach taxpaying age.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my colleague, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER], for his timeliness in bringing this matter to the public's attention and to the attention of our colleagues.

Mr. ALEXANDER Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] for his contribution.

If I could urge the people I know throughout my congressional district to just listen to this debate and to those remarks that have been made today, we would all make a beginning toward resolving this enormous deficit that is demonstrated here on this chart. Only by coming to grips with the facts can we begin to formulate a plan that will offer a solution to the enormous problem that faces our Nation.

Certainly we cannot continue to ignore this increasing deficit which began 1 year following the President's inauguration—$110 billion in 1982, a $196 billion deficit in 1983, a $189 billion deficit in 1984, and a $222 billion deficit in 1985. And the President himself projects a $180 billion deficit for fiscal year 1986, which everyone knows is the only conservative part of the budget that the President has submitted to the American people. It is more likely to be $230 billion if one should add all of the columns and subtract therefrom a lack of revenues that are needed in order to contribute to the balancing of our budget.

Mr. Speaker, I seek my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK], who is here, and I yield to him for the purpose of responding to the President's budget.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Arkansas. He and the gentleman from Texas are performing an important service in elucidating this issue to the American public.

There might be a certain amount of confusion because people might have been under the impression during the last Presidential campaign that they were listening to the President talk about the budget of the United States. We learn now that apparently he was not. That, you may remember, was a budget which had a deficit out of which we were going to grow. All of that ended on election day, the notion that we could grow out of the deficit without any serious problems.

I think it ought to be clear that the budget we have before us is not the budget on which the President campaigned. I say that because it seems to be in the interest of our democratic system there ought to be some tenuous relationship between the things a candidate talks about in his or her campaign and the things that are subsequently proposed.

Let us talk for just a minute about the housing project in Buffalo of recent but apparently dim memory. The President dedicated a housing project in Buffalo during the campaign, and Walter Mondale said during one of their debates that the President's proposals had made that kind of housing impossible. The President denied that. The President was, of course, wrong, and it appears to bother neither him nor a lot of other people very much when he is wrong.

He had already ended that kind of housing, but at the very least the President could have said:

> Yes, but I support a small number of units only for the elderly and the severely handicapped, built by nonprofit institutions.

The President did not like the housing programs that were there, but he did come forward with a voucher program that his own Secretary of HUD talked about. He came forward with the units for the elderly and handicapped which had existed and he is now proposing that we end those.

There will not be under this budget a unit of housing built for the desperately poor elderly in this society. We can do everything that is proposed to aid the homeless with short-term advantage, but if we do as the President asks we will also exacerbate the problem of the inadequate supply of lower income housing that the homeless problem can only get worse.

Now, people have a right to make any proposals they want, but let us not if this budget is adopted, and every proposal that has been made to help people with housing programs, the administration's own voucher programs, which they are subjecting to infanticide very early in its young life.

Housing built by nonprofit institutions for the elderly and handicapped, the administration has changed the regulations. They told us they would be made as efficient as possible. They are going to end that.

If this budget is adopted and 1½ years from now we have many more homeless, let us at least not pretend that these homeless were sent to us from Mars. Let us not wonder where they came from. The increase in homeless will be the result of a refusal to build a single unit, a single unit in this country of housing.

Let us talk about other areas. There is one thing that should be clear now. We are not differing, those of us on the Democratic side, with the President over the overall amount of money to be spent. This is not a fight about how much the Government should spend so much, it is about what the priorities should be.

The President sends us a budget with a significant increase in military spending. It is not an increase if you compare it to the Rose Garden. It is not an increase if you compare it to Caspar Weinberger's dreams. It is not an increase if you think about what it might have been, except that it is an increase. Every semantic evasion known to man will be dragged out to deny that a $34 billion increase is an increase, but it is. We have military needs, but we have security needs here at home.

I think the people I represent believe in many cases that they are more in need of protection on their own streets at night than they are in some of the places this administration seeks to protect them.

I think most people would feel that a budget which says that we will have an MX missile, an expensive and unnecessary, an inefficient and even dangerous weapon, will have that at a cost of billions, but will abolish all revenue sharing so that the cities you live in will not be able to hire as many police officers as they used to.

We are being asked to take an MX missile and sacrifice police officers.

We are being asked to continue to build an airport in Grenada and we are building that airport in Grenada that the President said had only one purpose, to allow for the facilitation of a Cuban invasion.

Well, apparently our freiend, the gentleman from Arkansas, has more influence with this administration than he realizes. I mean, he has gone and talked to Cuba. Maybe the President will not talk to the Cubans, but he is building them an airport, because he went on television, and he is our President, he tells only the truth as he knows it, and he said that this airport had only one purpose and it was to facilitate a Cuban invasion.

Well, who is now building this airport which has only that one purpose? The taxpayers of America.

The city of Fall River, which I represent, which has had economic problems because of trade, because of unfair imports, because of an overvalued dollar, they are told by this administration that there will be no more urban programs to help them get jobs. They will lose revenue sharing. They will get cut way back on aid to public transportation. They will get no urban development action grants. The community development block grants will be cut back. All of that will be cut back, but I can say to the people of Fall River:

> Despair not. You may be losing police and losing street lights and you may be losing public transportation and you will be losing the UDAG program, which helps to get jobs, but know in your hearts that you helped build an airport in Grenada and that should make you of good cheer.

I do believe that the people in this country want to be helpful to others. The outpouring of concern over starvation in Africa was moving. The American people are not selfish and hardhearted, but I do not think that the people of Fall River, those who lost their jobs because of a subsidized foreign textile industry and an overvalued dollar are going to be in a mood to see vital urban services cut back, while at the same time we build an airport in Grenada and an MX missile and continue with many of the other areas of waste that the administration is supporting.

The point made by the gentleman from Arkansas and the gentleman from Texas has to be hammered home. It is the President of the United States who has said to the Congress, "Please enact a deficit that will be $180 billion." That is the President's request. That brings pain to the faces of our Republican colleagues who have entered at this inopportune time and I am sorry to have to be the one to reiterate the bad news to them; but if we did everything the President wanted, the deficit would be $180 billion by his projection, and everybody who believes his projection by now are setting themselves up to be twice burned. No one thinks if we did everything he says that it will be only $180 billion.

We have to address the deficit in a more serious way. What we got from the President, I am afraid, is not a serious effort to reduce the deficit. He asks us for a deficit of $180 billion.

He also has in there, of course, no tax increases, but fee increases. When is a tax not a tax? When the President has promised not to raise any and he needs the dough. Then he calls it a fee increase. If you are out there on your boat, you will not be paying a tax. You will be paying a fee. It will cost you the same amount of money. The dollars will be the same, but it will not be called a tax increase.

The President has sent us a proposal which if it goes exactly as he hopes, wishes and prays, will be a deficit of $180 billion. It will not be a deficit of $180 billion, it will be $180 billion deficit in which we build an MX missile and require police forces to be cut back, in which we build an airport for the people of Grenada and maybe for that Cuban invasion they may or may not decide, but we will not allow programs to help with the economic development to our cities.

We will build some housing. It will be in various parts of the globe, but not one unit will be added to the stock for those who are in desperate need.

It is a budget that manages to give us the worst of both worlds, an enormous deficit and a very regressive set of social priorities.

The American people will continue to be victimized by a budget deficit which has distorting effects, long term on the economy, and at the same time will get very little benefit from it.

I think the House can do better. I appreciate the initiative of the gentleman from Arkansas in giving us a chance to begin to lay out the implications of the President's budget and the need for us to do better.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I thank the gentleman for his comments and observation and especially for his noting that the very best that the President hopes to do if all his policies are enacted is to establish a deficit for fiscal year 1986 of $180 billion, the best that he can do.

Remember, just 4 years ago when Ronald Reagan was campaigning, he was Governor Reagan then, campaigning against the former President, Jimmy Carter. I remember I was in Mountainview, AR, and I heard the President's comments when he was criticizing former President Carter, saying:

> Can you imagine that while Jimmy Carter has been President, that he has allowed our Federal budget to become in such terrible shape that there is a $30 billion deficit?
> $30 billion, imagine that, if you were running a business in this country and you have to balance your budget every week or every year that Jimmy Carter has allowed our fiscal problems in this country to become so bad that it is $30 billion.

The first year after Ronald Reagan was President, what did he have, $110 billion. The second year, $196 billion. The third year, $189 billion. Last year, a $222 billion deficit and the best that he can do for next year is $180 billion.

Ronald Reagan is the Babe Ruth of deficits. He is the champion of all previous Presidents of creating red ink for the American people. There is none better. We have never fielded a team like Ronald Reagan and his White House, to contribute so much in such a short period of time to the Federal deficit. If he has done nothing else while he has been President, he has retired the cup on creating deficits under Federal budgets.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRANK. I have to rise as a former Yankee fan to the defense of Babe Ruth, because I would make just this one distinction. When Babe Ruth hit one of his most famous home runs, he pointed to where he was going to hit it, you will remember when he played the Chicago Cubs.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do, indeed.

Mr. FRANK. Babe Ruth told us he was going to hit it that way. The President, if he were to be the equivalent of Babe Ruth, would have pointed to right field and then hit the longest foul ball in the history of baseball. It would have left Yankee Stadium and I think would have landed somewhere in Hoboken, probably near Frank Sinatra's hometown, which would have been appropriate, given their friendship.

So in fairness to Babe Ruth, when he set the record, he told us which way he was going to hit it.

The President, as the gentleman from Arkansas pointed out, told us he was going to make the American people forget about Jimmy Carter's deficits, but we did not understand that he meant to do it by making Jimmy Carter's deficits look insignificant in size, not just be a memory.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts. It was a very poor analogy because Ronald Reagan, obviously, has never played baseball because he cannot keep his eye on the ball. In fact, he has caused the American people, through his great talent of communication, to take our eyes off the ball and look in a different direction, in the direction of prosperity and temporary recovery in our economy to totally ignore these enormous deficits that are historic and history making, certainly the largest deficits ever created in history in all time.

Never before has any head of state created such enormous deficits as Ronald Reagan has during his 4 short years in the White House. In fact, if you should add up all of this red ink and total it you would conclude that Ronald Reagan has created more deficits in only 4 years than all previous American Presidents combined, from George Washington through Jimmy Carter. All of them combined have created less deficit during our entire history than Ronald Reagan has in 4 years, and yet he is parading around pretending to be conservative.

He is not conservative. He is the most radical fiscal President we have ever had in the history of this Nation.

While I have the time I would like to devote a few minutes to some of the particulars, some of the details of this budget, and before the arrival of the chairman of the Budget Committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] who is presently engaged in a news conference, and who will depart that news conference momentarily and come here. I will then yield time to him in order that he can report to the American people immediately following the news conference that he is having now.

I noticed last weekend that the White House staff was instructed to wear earmuffs. You know the Republicans are real cute about the way they go about politics. They always illustrate what they are doing with some little gimmick to draw attention to it.

The idea of the earmuffs was to demonstrate the concept of a freeze, that the President was going to offer a freeze in this budget to freeze the Government spending at last year's levels so that it would not increase beyond what he did last year.

I am here today to report that such was not the case at all. The truth is that the earmuffs were worn, in my judgment, to prevent the thoughtful people at the White House, and there are many good ones there, from hearing the truth about this budget and the truth about this deficit.

The truth is that their budget is anything but a freeze on Government spending. The freeze is the last thing that this budget is.

It is a freeze maybe on some of the important programs that the President intends to dismantle. It is a freeze to the farmers who will be put out in the cold, in the bitter arctic wind of the Midwest. It is a freeze to schoolchildren whose lunches are cut back substantially. It is a freeze to small businessmen who want to start up a business or to expand their business because of the dismantlement of the Small Business Administration.

It may be a freeze to them. But it is not a freeze in spending across the board because what this budget does is to increase defense, to increase foreign aid, and to cut back aid to our own people in this country who need it, like the American farmer, like our schoolchildren who are trying to get an education, like the poor, and the handicapped, and the elderly, who are frozen out by this President's budget and by imposing a freeze upon their programs, and even a cutback.

I made a speech not too long ago up in New York and I was asked what this freeze meant and where this President was going to take the cutbacks. I said he will pick on the poor people and the elderly people and the handicapped and the children and the poor farmers who are trying to grub out a living out on the farms in the Midwest and in the Southwest and in the Deep South of this country. He will not take on the rich and the powerful because they can fight back.

The Wall Street friends of Ronald Reagan can hire the best lawyers in the country to represent them, but the blind, and the elderly, and the handicapped, they cannot fight back. They are represented here by Members of Congress who are speaking out today in their behalf. They are the ones who are ignored in this budget: the poor people, the blind people, the handicapped, the little children. Those are the people that Mr. Reagan is freezing out of this budget, not the rich and the powerful on Wall Street who have not only the money but the resources to fight back.

I see my friend from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Budget Committee, has just entered the Chamber.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY], the chairman of our Budget Committee, who will respond to the President's budget.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, distinguished colleagues and the gentleman from Arkansas, we gather today when the President has submitted to the Congress his economic blueprint for continued good health of our economy.

There are, first of all, two things that I would like to share with my colleagues and with the American people. First, I am concerned that the President's budget does not respond to the future economic crisis which his deficit spending invites. Second, I am concerned about the need to maintain a proper balance and equity as we make the difficult choices on how to cut Government spending.

The President, in his budget submission to us today, has given us essentially a repeat of the policies which have predicated huge deficits during the past 4 years.

Why is that a problem? It is a problem because we are burdening ourselves and our children with intolerable and perhaps a ruinous burden of being forced to pay for the enormous Federal debt shown in the charts that I have before you today.

In a word, you will see that in the last 4 years the national debt has literally doubled and in the next 4 years, if we follow these policies of this budget, they will at least triple. Of course, we have heard the statement that these deficits are the result of 50 years of past spending.

I would like to share, Mr. Speaker, with you and my colleagues this average deficit for each President from 1934 to 1985, from Roosevelt to Reagan. If you will share a moment with me, you will see that in 1934, beginning with the Roosevelt Presidency, that during the entire time of that Presidency the deficits reached an average of $16.4 billion. Under the Truman Presidency, during all of the years of his Presidency and his leadership of the executive branch, the average deficit was $0.6 billion. During the Presidency of President Eisenhower the average deficit during that period was $1.9 billion. And during the Presidency of John F. Kennedy, the average deficit was $5.9 billion. During the Presidency of Lyndon Baines Johnson the average deficit was $7.1 billion. And during the Presidency of Richard Nixon the average deficit was $19 billion.

□ 1350

Under the Presidency of Gerald Ford that moved up to a record high at that time of $55.2 billion average deficit during his Presidency.

During the Carter Presidency it dropped to $48.5 billion, as the average deficit.

Then beginning in 1981 the average deficit for the last 4 years of this Presidency has been $175.9 billion.

Thus when we look at the deficits going back 50 years and how our national debt is growing and growing and the interest is being paid on that national debt, we see clearly that it is not the result of the 50 years of deficit spending but clearly there has been a dramatic change in fiscal policy under this administration.

What has been that change? That change has been essentially borrow, borrow, borrow, and spend, spend, spend.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Washington who is a senior member of the Committee on the Budget.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. I thank the distinguished chairman for this information.

Mr. Speaker, I am amazed. I cannot figure this out. I thought President Reagan was a President who is calling for a constitutional amendment to balance the budget. Something must be wrong with this chart here, Mr. Chairman. How could this President, who always goes out onto the steps and calls for a constitutional amendment to balance the budget, be the one who has that big red stripe there?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I will assure you that this chart is absolutely accurate and I would challenge anyone to question its accuracy. It was prepared by the House Budget Committee staff, a professional nonpartisan core staff.

If you look you will find, even if you start in 1947 on the second chart, that the historical deficits have a unique kind of line. In fact it was under LBJ that we had a balanced budget which was not so long ago. Suddenly in 1981 these long red towers, the world trade of deficits, have been created. The reason that they have been is because what we have been doing is simply spending, spending, spending and borrowing, borrowing, borrowing to pay for that spending.

Now, the problem that we face is simply this: That if we do not address the fiscal policy that created this average, if we do not address the fiscal policy that creates these enormous deficits and doubling, over the next 4 years, a tripling of the national debt, what is going to happen? Let me share with you: First of all, we will erode our Nation's savings so that most of the savings of this Nation will be utilized just to pay the interest on this debt by about 1990.

Our trade deficit has soared, setting record after record, and it has been accompanied by the loss of 2.5 million jobs to foreign competitiors, simply because these structural deficits cause an overvalued dollar and means we are less competitive in the international marketplace.

More importantly, we are just a couple of years away, if we continue to follow these fiscal policies, of becoming the world's largest debtor nation.

Now, I want to repeat that. The United States of America, in just a couple of years, will become the world's largest debtor nation. Our debt will be so large that we will be No. 1 in the world in terms of debt.

We are heading toward a point at which Americans will have to pay taxes of $230 billion per year, more than $900 for every man, woman, and child, just to pay the interest on this debt.

Every day this debt increases we make it harder for our businesses, our workers, and our Nation to remain competitive in that world marketplace.

If we do not control these deficits, if we do not reduce our dependency on foreign funds to finance our debt, we will burden ourselves and our children with taxes, foreign interest payments or inflation so high that our incomes and living standards will be seriously eroded.

Clearly this bill, of this debt, by these fiscal policies is going to be paid.

In that sense I am a little disappointed that the budget we received today is a continuation of the same fiscal policies which have caused the problem that now confronts us.

The President has not met the goals he set for himself many times prior to today.

The other point I would like to make to you, Mr. Speaker, is simply this: That I am committed to working with the administration and with my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to fashion a budget which demonstrates equity, compassion, while reducing the spending of our Government because if we do not, all of us will suffer whether we are the small farmer out in Iowa who is going through an extreme crisis right now, or whether we live in the inner city of north Philadelphia.

It is in all of our interests to deal with this problem. I think we can develop a budget which asks the American people to share the sacrifice, to share the sacrifice which will be necessary to reduce the deficit.

This week, Mr. Speaker, we will begin the process of fashioning a budget resolution in the House. We will be starting that process this Saturday with a series of regional hearings around this Nation followed by hearings here in Washington, DC. Our purpose will be threefold: First, we want to target and define the problem of the deficit for the American people; second, we want to share with the American people the various alternatives and difficult choices that confront us; and third, we want to get the input of the American people across this country as we prepare to decide among those choices.

Then we will hear from the administration's representatives. I am hopeful that despite these startling red lines that we will be able to work in a bipartisan fashion across all lines so that we can address the problem because it is not a Republican problem, it is not a Democratic problem, and it does none of us any good to point the finger at Congress and say they are to blame, but we must join in this, to deal with it, and I certainly hope that the administration, as it looks at these deficits, as it looks at the fiscal policies that created them, will join us here in the House so that we can come up with a fiscal policy that will move us away from becoming the largest debtor nation in the world and saddling future generations, unborn, with a debt that will change the American dream and make it a hopeless, nostalgic memory of something in the past.

It is with that spirit that I seek to work with all in the House to make sure that we have deficit reductions, strong deficit reduction through spending cuts, but done with balance, with equity and fairness for all in this Nation.

I thank the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time to the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on the Budget.

Are there other Members who wish to address this important subject? If there are not, I would add only one fact that needs to be noticed, as we discuss this very startling, historic reality that faces our Nation. That is that just last week it was reported that the merchandise trade deficit which measures the amount of money that we spend for foreign goods, reached an all-time record deficit of $126 billion which is likewise startling because we are buying, as Americans, $126 billion more in products each year than we can afford to pay.

Mr. Speaker, I call upon this House to reject the budget that Mr. Reagan and his Republican colleagues have offered. It is unrealistic, it is unfair, it does not address the realities of our time, and it is wrong.

THE ENERGY CONSUMER REGULATORY REFORM ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. MOORHEAD] is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join colleagues from both sides of the aisle in introducing the Energy Consumer Regulatory Reform Act. This legislation will reform six energy regulatory statutes that are needlessly burdening consumers, small and large businesses, and utilities alike. Identical legislation was introduced last Congress by a bipartisan coalition of Congressmen who recognize the value of an unfettered energy marketplace in satisfying our country's future energy needs. We have learned over the last decade that reliance on the marketplace must be the cornerstone of our national energy policy.

The bill I am introducing today will help to end Government interference in the marketplace by repealing several mandatory conservation measures, including: The building energy performance standards; industrial energy conservation reporting regulations; the Residential and Commercial Apartment Conservation Service Programs; the Department of Energy intervention authority in State utility proceedings, and the mandate requiring consideration of national retail electric rates; and the Emergency Energy Conservation Act of 1970.

These mandatory conservation measures, rather than helping to reduce our dependence on foreign oil, have burdened small businesses, cost energy consumers millions of dollars, and distorted the marketplace for alternative energy conservation products and services over the last decade. These statutes have required small energy consumers to subsidize duplicate energy conservation programs; they have placed a regulatory straightjacket on State and local officials, they have hampered the valuable work of energy conservation entrepreneurs, have exacerbated the Federal deficit, and have involved the Federal Government in the regulation of public utility rates—traditionally a local responsibility that can be handled more effectively and less expensively by State and local governments.

Most importantly, many of the statutes that would be reformed by my bill have attempted to substitute the Federal Government for the operation of the marketplace in areas where the free market is already solving the problem. The building energy performance standards, the Residential and Commercial Apartment Conservation Service Programs, and appliance efficiency standards are clear examples of the folly of this policy. These programs attempted to mandate energy efficiency and proved to be both costly and unnecessary. Higher energy prices spurred the housing industry to increase energy efficiency in new houses. Manufacturers responded to consumer preferences with major consumer products with much greater operating efficiency. Also, studies of the Residential Conservation Service Program has shown that audit participation rates never achieved the levels originally anticipated—not because of the public's insensitivity to conservation, but because households had already responded to high energy prices by hiring private energy entrepreneurs to conduct audits and by purchasing cost-effective conservation devices.

Mr. Speaker, the limited Federal dollars available for energy projects should not be wasted on bureaucratic redtape and burdensome and costly regulations. Both bodies of Congress recognized this fact last year in our consideration of the Commercial Apartment Conservation Service [CACS] Program. The House acknowledged the harm and expense to ratepayers associated with CACS when we voted to repeal this program. For its part, the Senate voted to postpone implementation of CACS for a year. Unfortunately, due to time constraints, we were unable to resolve this issue. I have confidence that we will take this program up again in this Congress—but our attention should not be focused exclusively on CACS. I ask my colleagues to review the legislation I am introducing today and each of the mandatory conservation measures it would rescind. A short synopsis of this bill's provisions follows this statement. I urge my colleagues to study this issue and join with me in supporting the Energy Consumer's Regulatory Reform Act of 1985.

SYNOPSIS OF THE ENERGY CONSUMERS' REGULATORY REFORM ACT OF 1985

SECTION 1—SHORT TITLE

SECTION 2—FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SECTION 3—REPEAL OF BUILDING ENERGY PERFORMANCE STANDARDS (TITLE III OF ECPA)

The Building Energy Performance Standards regulatory authority would be repealed. Authority for DOE to provide technical assistance to the building industry would continue under the "Buildings and Community Systems" portion of the DOE Authorization bill.

SECTION 4—REPEAL OF RESIDENTIAL AND APARTMENT CONSERVATION SERVICE (TITLE II OF NECPA, TITLE V OF THE ENERGY SECURITY ACT)

Federal statutes which mandate that electric and gas utilities offer energy audits to residents and commercial building operators under burdensome regulatory standards would be eliminated. Existing utility energy audit programs could continue under State and local law.

SECTION 5—REPEAL OF CONSUMER APPLIANCE EFFICIENCY STANDARDS (TITLE III OF ECPA)

DOE authority to regulate the energy efficiency of consumer appliances would be repealed. The requirement that consumer appliances display energy efficient labels would be continued.

SECTION 6—REPEAL OF DOE INTERVENTION AUTHORITY AND NATIONAL RETAIL ELECTRIC RATE STANDARDS (PURPA)

Sections of the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act of 1978 which authorize DOE to intervene in State utility proceedings and which mandate consideration of national retail electric rate standards would be repealed. DOE intervention in State utility proceedings intrudes on matters exclusively the concern of State and local governments, and most State utility commissions have completed their consideration of national retail electric rate standards. Section 210 of PURPA regarding small producers and cogeneration would be retained.

SECTION 7—REPEAL OF INDUSTRIAL ENERGY CONSERVATION REPORTING REGULATIONS (TITLE III OF EPCA)

The industrial energy conservation reporting requirements, which burden businesses with needless and duplicative paperwork, would be repealed. The industrial sector has been the top achiever in energy conservation compared to all other sectors since the 1973 Arab oil embargo. The Federal Government has no business imposing additional regulatory burdens on industry unrelated to public health or safety. Voluntary industry reporting of energy conservation gains would continue.

SECTION 8—REPEAL OF EMERGENCY ENERGY CONSERVATION ACT

DOE stand-by authority to preempt State and local energy emergency consumption targets would be repealed. Presidential authority to allocate energy supplies in an emergency would not be affected by repeal of this regulatory authority.●

THE TRADE DEFICIT

The SPEAKER pro tempro. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions, from the beginning of my service in the Congress I have addressed my colleagues through this means; since the first month that I came to this House, which was January 10, 1962, and have always addressed myself to my colleagues. Of course, it was not dreamed at that time that the proceedings of the House would be covered by television; and to me it makes no difference; I am happy to enlarge the participation of the constituencies in the proceedings of this House.

There has always been a very definite purpose in mind for importuning the Members of the House as well as the staff of the Clerk and others that open the doors, so to speak, and close the doors of the proceedings of the House of Representatives.

Always the intent has been a blend of two. One to proceed in an enlarged fashion which the limited debate rules prevent in the House Representatives, a numerous body, from so doing on either a matter that has a direct, almost exclusive, impact on the parochial or local interests of the given district, the 20th Congressional of Texas, or one that partakes of a national importance or imminence and which I feel is an indefensible part of our duties; that is, just because the extent of our jurisdiction is limited to the geographic bonds of the given district that we have issued which transcend the parochialism of the district's interests.

Today I would like to start by outlining the general interest which concerns me and which I feel even with discussions such as we have had are not being addressed either in debate or otherwise by either the Congress or the executive branch of the Government and which are absolutely necessary that they be debated because without debate and discussion in our society, we cannot have participatory democracy.

The issues are so grave, so imminent in what can be crises, that I feel impelled to rise as I have over the course of these 23 years to do so.

I might remind my colleagues of recent joinder as Members of this House, that on such issues as the murder of a Federal judge, the attempted murder of a Federal district attorney in the western judicial district for Texas, that I spoke singlehandedly a total of more than 39 times, but not until the murder of that judge was at least resolved as far as it could be up to that point—though I am afraid not really fully and completely for the best interests of the Nation.

It was a murder that occurred on the outside of my district, but which was within the county which for my first 8 years I had the honor of representing, because the county was contiguous and the same as the 20th Congressional District at that time.

I felt that the meaning and significance of this greatest crime of the century, on par with the assassination of President Kennedy because of its implication to our form of government. There were months in which the judiciary and other Federal officials connected with law enforcement were actually intimidated, and nothing was being done, and that case was going to be lost in the dust of history.

I am glad that I did, even though I was criticized, I was ridiculed, I was accused of seeking some purpose; we live in a cynical age; if one does anything the question is, What's his angle? What's he going to get out of it? And I faced that ever since I started my political career 33 years ago, 34 years ago on the city council.

Today I am going to start with one aspect which I believe impacts on our domestic resolutions, no matter what they are as we address these turning serious, deeply rooted problems that are coming up from the midst of our society.

First and foremost is the question of the international trade deficit. For the first time in the history of any Nation, our trade deficit when we ended the last quarter of this last year, 1984, was in excess of $133 billion, yet nobody discusses this. There has been no debate.

During the Presidential debates, no allusion was made that that nor an issue drawn, by either one; the incumbent President or the challenger. Here in the Halls of Congress I have waited for years, since 1960 and 1961 which were the 2 years preceding my entry into this body, for the first time then the trade deficit had reached $10 billion and it was considered disastrous.

The whole subject of conversation, the concentrated effort and energy of the President that first year was to address that problem. Even then, the preceptions of the world were just as misperceived by our leaders as they are today. Nobody asks, why? What is the basic underlying cause? Sure this is the immediate, but what is the basic underlying cause?

Nowhere in the 10 or 11 volumes of the collected and published addresses and papers of President Eisenhower is there one reference to the Common Market of Europe which was in the process of development. My first year here in 1962, one of the big issues was the Trade Act that President Kennedy, the closest friend I have ever had on that level; a close and intimate friendship, and I was asked to vote for it. It was going to be the first round of the so-called General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs, or the GATT.

I read it, and I read some provisos that disturbed me, as I do almost everything that I am asked to vote on. I raised questions, and they couldn't be answered satisfactorily, so I voted "no." Immediately I had all my friends jumping all over me, asking, How in the world could you have done this? I said because there are certain provisos.

One of them, you say this is taking cognizance of this thing called the Common Market of Europe. Yet I do not see any evidence that the implications of that development will have as I look into the future.

But you also have a provision here that says in the case that as a result of the adoption of this legislation there is some American trade activity or industry, industrial or manufacturing enterprise, that suffers detriment, this Commission shall be established to consider this deterimental impact and see what can be done about it. If on the one hand you tell me it is advantageous, there is no prospect of detriment to the country if we approve, yet you have this proviso on the other hand saying, well, maybe there will be. Can you tell me wherein and how that possibility can arise? Well, it will never happen.

I had that happen before and I have had it happen subsequently and when it does I vote "no." No matter what the political consequences might be. I do not think that is an act of bravery. I think that is an act of being responsive and responsible under the oath of office that I have taken, which simply says: I shall to the best of my ability, will and faithfully discharge my duties as a Representative.

Well, lo and behold, today the international trade dificit for the United States is well better than $133 billion. Now, just like in the case of interest, which I have gotten up ad nauseam and discussed here for 20 or the 23 years I have been a Member of the House and member of the Banking Committee since I first came in and still am. And very much like a coyote, baying out in the brush country at the moon at midnight that is pretty much the way I have felt, pretty lonely. I hate to feel that I can say, well, I told you so. I hate to say that for 14 months and for 12 of those 14 months the only voice in or out of the Congress, House or Senate, I was asking the President, Mr. President, what is the mission of our marines in Beirut? And at 4 days before their murder I asked that question as the House was adjourning for that week and asked my colleagues, "Gentlemen, please, how can you. You haven't discussed. How can you go home tonight, eat a nice good steak at suppertime and you, Mr. President, up in the White House, you will retire to your dining room and not give thought to those marines that are under the shadow of death this very moment." How could a President in heedless and callous disregard of the unanimous advice of his own Joint Chiefs of Staff, that is our expertise in military matters, why have them if a Commander in Chief calculatingly ignores. You do not have to be a prophet to know that under those circumstances you are going to have a catastrophe. But who gives a hoot or a hollar for any 1 of those dead 242 marines? The President does not seem to have any worry about going to sleep at night and having that on his conscience. Yet, single handedly, willfully, not because of a week's determination, but 14 months. Why? Why is it that we can sit here and think we can temporize without even debating the question $133 billion plus of trade deficit. We can temporize with these charts and these domestic I think that that is one reason the President smiles and all of that and what he used to say was unpardonable, now it is tolerable, because we can play around I would say for the next 2 years. Even though two-thirds—even those charts reveal it, even the other side's charts reveal it, if they put them out—two-thirds of the cost of our military outlays which everybody is shooting at are interest payments for that borrowing, two-thirds. That goes back to this other fundamental question of interest which will be the second part of what I wish to address.

Generally because every year I have been a Member of this body or any other legislative body if I have gotten up and I have criticized and I have said this is a mistake, I have offered a suggested alternative and I have done precisely that in every one of these issues. I did it in the State senate. I did it on the city council of the city of San Antonio and I have done it for 23 years and 3 months in the U.S. House of Representatives.

Why? Why is it that we think we can temporize with that? Which means jobs, which means not that we have these monstrous domestic deficits, but that America has been converted from a producing nation; a nation that produces goods, food, fiber and other materials, to a dumping market of all the world from Japan to China, to France, Germany, and England.

Why? That is the reason that we have the deficits, but why could we get into that to begin with. Well, it is not a simplistic matter. It is complicated. Other policies that either have been implemented or have never been put together, either the President's or the absence of policies that are very basic but which have been ignored and incidentally, from time to time, the Congress has aided and abetted in producing from the willful, arrogating usurpation of power by the Federal Reserve Board, who among all the speakers today on this side and on that side will be willing to confront the root causes of our dilemma and the reason why before we even celebrate the bicentennial of our form of government in 1989 we are destroying the very pillars that the men who founded the Nation and ruled as Presidents for at least three terms after the first under this form of government, felt were the critical and basic issues. And which, incidentally have been in all countries and all lands and all climes at all times and that is who has the power to determine the credit allocation, the financial allocation of any nation's society.

When President Kennedy and those who drafted that Trade Act of 1962 did so, they did perceive in a world that was no longer so. When we are asked today to pass and approve a so-called defense budget of about now—if the President's requests are satisfied—$315 billion, who is asking the question about how much of that represents the outlay for "the defense of Europe?" Nobody does. Every statement I heard on either side, every statement uttered from the Presidents since I have been here has been based with respect to a defense budget at a world's outlook and perception that was true in 1946, 1947 but no longer true. It is another world. Over half of that defense budget—and these are my estimates, though I have been told they are not wrong, they are not astray, they are not out of the ball park because there is no other voice that has arisen here to ask the gentleman involved in the approval of the appropriation bills if they could tell me what amount in that budget or in that appropriation was destined for the so-called defense of Europe. They said, "Oh, we can't tell you because it is scattered here, it is scattered there, it is scattered everywhere." It is almost as bad as the moneys that the CIA has. There is not a soul in this Congress that can tell me how much money is allocated to the CIA. The President's discretionary budget, that is, that is the amount of money he can play around with that is not budgeted specifically, that he has discretion to use any way he wants, has grown 700 percent, more than that, 7½ times in just 3 years. How much of that goes to the CIA? There is not a man who can tell you. Maybe the President himself does not even know. I do not know.

All I know is this: That when I raised a question why is it you are predicating your policies and asking us to tax the American people in this amount for a defense posture that assumes that there are certain conditions that are no longer true, why is it you do not even debate?

The other day a West German Federal Government official from one of the provinces said, "We are not American vassals. We are coequals. We are allies."

When has this House debated the fact that the real issue in the deployment of the Pershing II, even in the cruise missile in England, was for the first time the German finger on the bomb?

This is the initial basic issue in the post-war period, even during the terminal points of the war, that is, the German question, that gave rise to what now we take as a matter of scriptural word that Russia is the eternal enemy and that the cold war is because we must defend against communism.

We have come in other areas of the world as inheritors of the old colonial power responsibilities. Our perception of ourselves do not say that but they do not coincide with the world's perception of us, nor with the facts involved.

But if in Germany we have changed the designation of our troops from occupation to defense, would it not be very wise to find out what that interpretation is on the part of the German people? Is it not a wise individual who would consider the fact that the generations now on the threshold of power have no memory about what World War II really was about or means?

If we were German citizens, would we say their troops, if they were occupying our country, were defense forever, while our country was dismembered, and the basic issue that the nations have refused to want to consider, or could not, or were unable, and that was German reunification, if our leaders today are predicating their faith on the policy of a temporary German leader, as tenuous a hold as the leader of the West German Federal Republic has today, are we not then being rather foolish and naive to think that a crisis cannot develop in which the whole aims, purposes and responsibility for the 300,000 of our military and families who are there should be looked for? Should we wait until we have more of a few things that have happened already?

And, as I said, even prominent ministers say, "Hey, wait a while, we are not your vassals, we are your coequals. You are not occupying. We are just letting you be here for a while, though we think if you give us the resources, why, we could do a better job than you can, we have better soldiers than you have, and always have had."

Well, maybe that can be temporized. I do not think so. And I have been raising the issue now for a few years in which every time the appropriation comes up I will get on the record and say, "How much is this? It is for the defense of Europe, and is it predicated on the basis that you expect a terrain invasion," which really, really reveals our naivete about everybody involved.

Blithefully we have gone into the most nettlesome mixed up areas, with absolutely no conscious revelation of being steeped in that history, even, such as Middle Europe, in which for years we have had invasions one way and the other way.

Should we be naive to think that the Russians, having lost 20 million to a German invasion, should sit back and watch us without protest rearm Germany?

Even Maggie Thatcher would not let us station the cruise missile until we had joint management, that is, we cannot press the trigger unless they also come in and say, "OK, you can." When was that ever debated?

Central America, where I have tried futilely to bring about some consciousness of the responsibility of needed debate. The War Powers Resolution. I have introduced one, just the other day—I introduced it in the last session—in which I point out the President is in absolute violation of the War Powers Limitation Act.

We never had a debate on that. What was described as a debate turned out to be a test of loyalty: Were you for or were you against the President? Not on the War Powers Resolution in the last Congress.

I introduced one on Beirut, when the President could not answer or would not answer. And then I happened to find out about the Joint Chiefs of Staff, which revelation did not come to light until much after the marines had been killed.

I even introduced a bill of impeachment after the Grenada invasion. Today we hear one of our colleagues say, "Well, you know that airport that the President said the Cubans were building, we had to go in and take over the island? We are now doing it. We are now building it."

The truth at that time was that the invasion was immediately on the heels of the disaster in Lebanon.

The truth is that world opinion solidly is against us in that venture. There were only six countries, five of them absolute client states in the Caribbean, that if we cut them off they will have real crisis, and Israel, that backed us on Grenada. But constitutionally, who gave a hoot in this body that the President had violated three treaties, forever destroyed our moral, our actual physical ability to lead collectively in the Western World? We have gone completely unilateral and military intervention with no attempt to have a collective type of solution. Nobody says a thing here. There is no debate.

We are in the course of conducting war against the Nicaraguan regime there now called the Sandinistas, and have been now for more than a year. We have had some of our servicemen die there. They have not been reported that way. The truth is that they have. What is the difference, Vietnam, Central America? Yet where is the debate? Where is anybody challenging anybody on that?

No, the headlines will drag us into an open conflict sooner or later. I just heard a colleague here on the other side of the aisle just last week say, "Why, there is no question that if we keep going we will ultimately have to intervene with our own soldiers." He takes for granted that it is great for us to have training for our National Guardsmen in Honduras, as if Honduras were one of our States and not an independent sovereign body where the people from the beginning have been incensed and opposed to our occupation of the country. We are not there training. We are occupying Honduras. We have been at war in a very hypocritical fashion, because we have an Ambassador, a duly accredited Ambassador in Managua.

And while he talks nice and all of that, the CIA and other agents of our Government are attempting to assassinate their leaders; have killed many of their peasants in the border areas; have continued to finance the operations that would do what? Undo the regime, without one thought ever being expressed by anybody. Suppose you do, suppose even if we do invade and knock them out and have to do it that way, who is going to govern? The Contras? They are over 75 percent ex-Somocistas. They were kicked out by an indigenous revolution. Castro did not send soldiers to fight that revolution; Russia did not send one soldier and has not even now, to fight that revolution. It was a civil war. It was an indigenous uprising against the most despotic, cruel, inhuman regime in the whole world which we had imposed. For we have invaded Nicaragua at least half a dozen times, and the last time for 5 years in which we ended up in creating their National Guard and imposing what has turned out to be the Somoza regime.

We are identified with the despots, with the people that have long exploited and horribly abused the masses to the south of our border. Is anybody debating that? Is anybody really questioning? No, because the issue will be in the headlines, "Migs In Nicaragua." We have a duty to go in there and knock them out.

Well, Castro has had Migs, I do not know how long. Are we also going to invade Cuba? If so, I say this to my colleagues, and I said it before I came to this body, right on the eve of my coming to this body. In the case of the Bay of Pigs Invasion, I tried to point out, futilely, to then President-elect Kennedy, I was in the State senate. I became privy to some information from Miami. I found out that the CIA had invested $250 million alone in what would be an invasion.

In the Florida area alone, I forget how many millions. They also had a training camp in Nicaragua and other places in Central American areas. My informant said, "Look, I am one of the exiles, but it is not going to succeed. President Kennedy does not know the exact nature of what has already been committed since 1960. The group leading the invasion, even if they succeeded physically, will never be able to govern Cuba, unless the United States goes in, occupies Cuba and governs it, they will not do it." I say my friends, this is far truer in the case of Nicaragua even today.

Has anybody stopped to ask, suppose we give so much help to the so-called Contras, that they are able to physically or that we have to go in, as I am sure we are, the way we are going. There is nothing I see that is reversing the course that the President has set irreversibly when he ordered on both sides of the Isthmus, the heaviest military deployment in the history of that part of the world since we have known it and Columbus has discovered it. We have now 30,000 in the air, on the sea, on the land, surrounding Nicaragua alone. Is that accounted for here? I have not heard it.

So, when these issues, which really seem specific but really are general because what it is, it is basic to the policies or lack of policies that have as a premise a flawed perception of the world. Suppose our leaders had had the correct perception of the so-called Communist world, particularly in Southeast Asia. I doubt seriously that 50,000 of our soldiers would have died there; I doubt it seriously. The perceptions then, I recall them vividly. I went to innumerable White House conferences. At least that President had communication. I remember well.

Today, there is not a knowledgeable citizen that would say that that was the correct perception. We are being led by men whose perception of Central America, Latin America generally, are the 1929 perceptions. Even John Kennedy, who was idolized, and continues to be in Latin America, were he President today, and were he to try to launch the Alliance for Progress, he would not suceed, because that was a unilateral approach.

Twenty-three years ago, 24 years ago, yes; that was great; it was wonderful. Today, it would not fly. The real world has changed; it takes another approach. If a President, like President Reagan, who made the trip 2 years ago down to four or five countries, he came back to California and his first words in California were, "Gee, I did not know they were so different." That kind of perception is dangerous today not only because it is outmoded, but because it seems to be the premise for which our policies, such as they are, but which have led to fateful, and at this point seem to be irreversible courses. Why? Why would a President insist for 14 months in full knowledge of the vehement and united opposition of the Joint Chiefs of Staff? Why the other policies? Well, I do not know myself. I know it happens. I know that as a Member of this body, I look at my grandchildren and I say to myself, if what I see and think happens, and God forbid it does, what will they think, what will they say? Will they have a chance to say, "Well, my grandfather was a member of a national policymaking body, and he never once said a word." I think that would be the worst thing that could ever happen to me now or in afterlife.

I do not get up assured of being infallible; in fact, it is the other way around. But I do, as I said at the beginning today, based on a study, based on hearing the debate for hours, or what passes for discussion if not debate, and then raising questions. All I can do is cast a vote or record my voice. They are not answered; then nothing keeps me quiet. Why in 1965, with the great, illustrious chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Manny Cellars sitting there, and presenting the resolution that called for the 25th amendment to our Constitution, did I say, "Mr. Chairman, I cannot believe it; are you serious about this?" He said, "What is the matter with you; of course, we have got to do something. In all these crises we have had while Lyndon was President a whole year without a Vice President. Woodrow Wilson vegetated over there."

I said, "Yes, but this second section here, it seems to me that it calls for an elimination of that section or something else." Then he got angry with me so I had to come over here. The record will show I was one of about 28 that voted no. The record will also show that I was the only one that spoke into the record and said why I was voting no.

I said, "To me, this is reminiscent of the old, Roman Senate, and the potential for intrigue. It reminds me more recently and in modern times of the Third French Republic and those intrigues. Because how many know, how many stop even to stop to read the 25th amendment today?" The potential for mischief. Never did I dream or did I ever in my wildest fears imagine that in my lifetime I would see the realization of some of those fears when Henry Kissinger and General Haig got together and said, "If the President does not quit, we are going to invoke the 25th amendment."

Why? Why would I get up in 1965, never thinking any such thing would happen or that it would even be approved. Because, first, and above all, my background.

My father was what today would be called a refugee because he actually had been placed against a wall and was going to get shot, and through a miracle there he was saved and fled the country. But his roots had been there for 400 years, so the anguish of that exile cannot be described. But we were born here, and our parents never quite realized that.

I could see, and he, himself, would always say, "This great land has given me freedom and a chance to earn my bread and peace, which my own country could not. You love it and you respect it." Well, I do, and also realize that nowhere else, even there, perhaps even in my father's time with his own wealth and everything, I could never have given the opportunity, certainly not the great, tremendous honors and privileges of having served on every single legislative position as a representative that the community could offer without any attribute of wealth, without any attribute of social position. So I am grateful. If I cannot help to preserve that, I certainly am not going to do anything to diminish it one iota, and in that zeal, I tremble when I see the calculated course for catastrophe and danger and, therefore, I hope never through cowardice—I did one time only, and regret it, and that was when the Gulf of Tonkin resolution was brought up here and I hestitated two rollcalls, finally came up to the desk here and answered. My judgment said no, because the wording of that resolution was clear prescription for a backdoor war.

I was the last to vote, maybe, but I made up my mind never again to let the fear of embarrassment, the fear of being the only one, and I am glad to say up to now there have been a couple of times I was the only one, and I have been called peculiar or something, idiosyncratic.

But that is not the point. The point is if I could see that these issues were really being freely debated on the basis of the issues, not on partisanship, as my colleague said a while ago, not on the basis of who is to blame. It is too late for that. I think one of the things that I hold the President in less esteem for has been his constant, constant allusion to the predecessor as being the one to blame for everything, everything. After 4 years certainly that really is improper and that is the only thing I see repugant, that shocks me personally, in a personal way, because so what? What are we going to do to resolve it? What are we going to do now to anticipate, so that we can, therefore, prevent?

To me, that has always been my motto. Anticipatory presentations, legislation.

In 1966 we had the first credit crunch. I asked the chairman of the Banking Committee then, they used to call it the Committee on Banking and Currency, "Mr. Chairman, I think there are issues here that are ominous. You know, there is nothing to say that interest rates will not rise to 10 percent."

He said, "It will never happen. Over my dead body." At that time, they were barely 6 percent. They had just crept up.

But I said, "Mr. Chairman, there is nothing to prevent it. There are certain things that I see as I read the history of interest rates."

He finally shut me up by saying, "You are too deep for me; you are talking out of my range," because I said, "Mr. Chairman, there has been no society on earth, even 7,000 years before Jesus Christ, the Code of Hammurabi proscribed usurious interest charges. Even during the time that our Lord, Jesus Christ, was preaching, the law and penalty of death prevented usurious interest rates."

Today, in Japan, there is no interest charge that can exceed 7½ or 8 percent. The average is about 7 or 7½ percent. But in no way could they go to 9. That country is outproducing us, and we are becoming the consumer and not the producer. At the root of it is such a basic thing as that, but what will it take to reverse it? It is not simple, and it will take some hard, mean action that I am afraid now will come only after a crisis.

I have always been an enemy of crisis. These are not God-created crises. There are not acts of God. They are manmade. They are susceptible of manmade solutions. They are even susceptible of being prevented.

Why, at the height of war, on the Federal level, could this Government be using 46½ percent of the gross national product and still not have interest rates—the Government was paying barely 2 percent. Do not get me wrong. The bankers tried, but you had men who did not have to be told what the public interest was and where the real control should be.

Thomas Jefferson in the beginning, we must remember that in the first 10 years of our national existence, the founding people thought so little of such an office as the presidency they did not even have one, but what was the biggest issue? The allocation of credit, the Government's ability to use credit and at what charge, and they chartered the Bank of North America.

That was the issue. If you think anything I have ever said has been harsh to the so-called bankers, even though I am not talking about 95 percent of the bankers, you ought to read what Thomas Jefferson said, and later Andrew Jackson, with the First and Second Bank of the United States, the same issue: Who is going to control the allocation of credit, the people or the bankers?

You cannot survive with the monstrous trade deficit we have now as a viable industrial nation. We cannot piddle around with the domestic deficit. We cannot, for about every one of the $30 billion or so of the $133 billion, we have lost a million American jobs permanently—not temporarily, permanently. Of course it grieves me. This is my country.

But I also see a fatal, almost Greek tragic comedy enacted. The same elemental issues that we had after World War I we have confronted again in different form, in different nations, but essentially the same with almost the same identical mistakes, the banking system before 1929 overextending on the bonds of the Imperial Japanese Government, the bonds of the German Government.

I think the record ought to show that the Japanese Imperial bonds, that our depositors' money was being sucked up and invested through the New York firms and the international bankers, had a maturity date of 1941.

Well, of course, we got Pearl Harbor payment. I think it is interesting to note that we have the same thing now, but it is so basic because the people have lost the control of their own destiny in the United States with respect to these vital matters.

Why are they vital? Because they have everything to do with what we have done and are justifiably proud of—the American standard of living. I know of countries right across the border where, my goodness, the normal interest rate is 30 percent, if you were able to borrow down there, and you were going to pay that. But in America, as I have been futilely arguing since 1965, certainly with a lot of voice since 1965, it is fatal. We cannot anymore survive with this imbalance of trade for long. We can temporize with the other, but not with this.

In America our economy has been predicated, before World War II, as we proudly said, on mass production and mass consumption.

But I remember before the war I would walk the streets of my native city of San Antonio and I would see droves of little urchins, not at school, barefooted. The kid that stuck out like a sore thumb was the one that had shoes. Then after World War II the kid that sticks out like a sore thumb is the kid that goes barefooted. The variety, the beauty, and the color of our clothing is common. The poorest of the poor today can afford good clothing because of the abundance and diversity of production. But we cannot for long, as I think some segments of our economy show, if interest rates are exorbitant and in fact if they are as unconscionable and extortionate as they are today.

I do not know of a business that can, at 16 percent or even at 10 or 11 percent, borrow $1,000 or $2,000 to try to have a little floor inventory in a very small room in a truly small business today and pay that amount of interest and be in the swim for long. And that goes all through the economy.

If the Government has been paying, as it has been, over 12½ percent as a yield on long-term Treasurys and bonds and notes, my goodness, should we be amazed that two-thirds of our defense budget or two-thirds of our figure for spending is just for interest payments alone?

That goes also to the debt management. The Congress aided and abetted the highway robbery of the American people. Who cared? You look at your dollar bills today, and every one of them says, "Federal Reserve Note." You, the taxpayer, pay interest every time that bill is printed.

We are the only country in the industrialized world that handles our monetary and fiscal matters that way. It was not always that way. When I came to the Congress, I found just as many dollar bills that said, "Treasury Notes," not "Federal Reserve" but "Treasury."

Why the difference? Why does somebody not ask that? Was that debated? No.

So I conclude by saying that these issues I will again address as we go into this Congress, and God willing, given the opportunity, I will develop them in very specific terms. I have even introduced bills of impeachment of the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board.

Why would I do that? Because I was bombastic? No, the papers did not even report it. I do not go around making releases. I am speaking to the record and to my colleagues, because I can look back and I can tell my grandchildren, if it happens before I die as the 25th amendment, "Well, look. I did. At least I spoke."

We have had the benefit of a lot of history, not as a nation but the history of many others, including our Mother Country. We have had that benefit, but not lately. We have consumed our youth, our blood, and our Treasury in useless, meaningless, and hard-to-define quests of war.

Why? Why should it be? Is it certainly not inherent in our capacity as a national policymaking body, and first in the Constitution, to have that power because it is a representative branch? And I remind you again that the men who wrote that Constitution thought so much of that office that at first, during the debates in the Convention, it was called the Chief Magistrate. Why? Why did they place solely and exclusively the warmaking power in this body?

Well, I think recent history should have revealed that by now. But time is on us, and we can see that there is now such a close interaction that these outside forces at so-called recovery are illusory, because it is predicated on the forces that are external to our shores and that make us susceptible no matter what we do. We can tax ourselves to death and in fact cut everything from Social Security to half of defense, and we will still have the threat of that deficit and our dependence on external foreign forces that have no prime allegiance to us, that never have and never will, because we have traded our heritage for a mess of pottage.

Mr. Speaker, I will close by saying that yesterday I had the honor of addressing the National Association of Housing Officials here in Washington, and I place in the RECORD the remarks I made yesterday, as follows:

REMARKS OF U.S. REPRESENTATIVE HENRY B. GONZALEZ

HOUSING: THE TIME TO CHOOSE

When President Reagan transmits his fiscal year 1986 budget proposal to Congress, we will at last come down to the basic, irreducible issue in housing and community development. Will this nation have any housing policy? Will this nation have any policy for community redevelopment? There will be some who will argue that the President's proposal will be meaningless, since his budget has been declared dead even before its delivery to Congress. There will be some who will argue that in view of the urgent need to reduce the Federal budget deficit, housing program should be zeroed out for a year, and that further cuts in community development funds are an essential part of a painful budget reduction process; and they will say housing program can be revived at some future date. But the blunt truth is that Congress must this year face the housing and community development question for what it is—a matter of principle. If we do not have a national policy on housing and community development now, then when will we? If those who are committed to housing and community development do not take a stand now, then when will they? For the time of temporizing and compromising is past. The time to take a stand on basic principle is now. This year is the time to choose.

The President's budget will show a repudiation even of the housing programs that he has personally espoused—specifically, assisted housing production for the elderly and handicapped, and the housing voucher program that his administration has presented as the ultimate solution to the housing needs of poor and moderate income Americans. His budget will request nothing for new housing production programs. It will request a termination of the Urban Development Action Grant Program, and it will propose a ten per cent cutback in the Community Development Block Grant Program. His program calls for the imposition of new fees on the secondary mortgage market operations of FNMA and GNMA; and he will continue to advocate, in one degree or another, limiting even FHA mortgage insurance to individuals and families who can in no other way obtain mortgage financing—reducing FHA to a meaningless, vestigial role in housing, despite fifty years of exceptional performance.

The American political system owes its durability and strength to the fact that it has been predicated more on pragmatism than ideology. American political leaders have generally differed on a few matters of principle, but have worked toward pragmatic solutions rather than become impaled on unyielding devotion to some narrow and empty ideology. Our government has not, for instance, tried to pour every thought and program through a theological strainer of Marxist thought. But contrary to the basic American tradition, the Reagan administration has embraced a peculiar theology of its own, a theology that disregards practicality, discounts the truth, and never stops to count the social cost, and to which it clings with enormous zeal.

Because of its ideological blindness, the Reagan administration does not, as its predecessors did, evaluate programs on the basis of their effectiveness, nor on the basis of demonstrable needs, nor does it evaluate programs on the basis of how well they have met defined national needs and goals. The Reagan approach is not one of practicality, but ideology. If a program does not fit with the ideology of these latter-day Luddites, it is deemed worthless and ready for the scrap heap. It matters not what the needs are, nor how effective a program is, nor how pragmatic its application may be; if it fails to meet the measure of Ronald Reagan's ideological Procrustean bed, it is chopped off. By contrast, any program that fits within the ideology is maintained, regardless of how ineffective or wasteful it might be, or how much it might be discredited. Thus, no matter how great the need for assisted housing construction, it fails to meet the test of the pure market ideology, and perforce is eliminated from any possibility of White House support; but because the MX missile fits the Reagan ideology of nuclear superiority at any cost, the President clings to it with the tenacity of a bulldog regardless of its credibility or cost. Likewise, the Administration will use all possible means, legal, extralegal, or questionably legal, to win an ideological point, either to keep alive something they support, or to kill and cripple something they oppose but cannot persuade Congress to eliminate as had happened with the Legal Services Corporation.

The Reagan approach has thus brought a profound and disturbing change to our political system. It has legitimized the thoughtless, empowered the fanatic, and enfeebled the ability of the Congress and Executive alike to deal with economic and social problems in a realistic, effective way. This blind devotion to ideology has caused the White House to claim that deficits either are no problem, or that they will vanish through the magic of supply-side economics, years after that notion has been discredited by all but the most pale-eyed fanatics of the Republican right wing. A President whose minions must bend in the direction of approved thought, regardless of realities, is something new on the American scene. It is as if our political system had been taken over by the mirror image of a nineteenth century European ideologue.

Our political system has long recognized that it's better to have a program that works than it is to have one that fits into a convenient set of preconceived ideas. This is why our political parties have not become splinter groups, and why the parties have sought to find new constituencies. Our system has been inclusive, not exclusive, because it has sought to provide solutions, not worship fixed ideas. But today, we are in danger of becoming immobilized by political buzz words and catch phrases, frozen by an inability and unwillingness to see the world as it really is, and enfeebled by a refusal to agree on what works; we are increasingly debating the economic theology of how many angels there are on the head of a pin, and not the practical question of whether or not the pin works or is relevant in a world blessed with buttons and zippers.

So it is that in issue after issue, the discussion has turned from how to meet the problem, to the question of whether there is a problem at all. Politics is thus being reduced to a state of irrelevance, while economic and social problems are growing apace. I submit that we cannot afford the luxury of this kind of drawing-room debate, if we expect this great and complex country to remain the dynamic engine of human and social growth, the world's symbol of progress and hope.

What kind of world would this be if Franklin D. Roosevelt had allowed himself to be fettered and frustrated by the unyielding isolationism of men like Gerald P. Nye, or had he been an isolationist himself? What kind of world would this be if he had embraced the cold hatred of the brown shirts or the hot demagoguery of Huey Long? Roosevelt was above all a practical man; he understood that the answers to the ills of the country and of the world lay not in magic catchwords, but in practical action. His approach to government was perhaps best expressed in these words, which also express the common-sense practicality that has given our political structure its supple strength:

"The country needs, and unless I mistake its temper, the country demands bold, persistent experimentation. It is common sense to take a method and try it. If it fails admit it frankly and try another. But above all, try something."

As much as anything else, this expressed the kind of political approach that this country has almost always followed—not one of slogans or image-making, not one of demagoguery and ducking the issue, but one of matter-of-factness and common sense, one of human decency and compassion.

The issue in housing this year is no different than the issue in education, or agriculture, or human nutrition, or foreign policy. In each case, the question is whether this government will respond to reality and fact with practicality and compassion. For example, the issue of unemployment is the fact of human hardship, not whether it is the ideologically pure and economically sound thing to tax unemployment compensation, not the stony economic question of whether in a pure sense unemployment exists at all. With millions out of work, we need to talk about jobs, not whether to tax the pitiful compensation that some—but by no means not all—of the unemployed receive. The practical and human question is how to get people back to work, not the academic issue of how to place taxes on human misery.

Unfortunately, those who advocate policies of humanity and compassion, of practical solutions to practical problems, have too long misunderstood the terms of today's political debate. Housing advocates and many others have thought that Ronald Reagan and his servants have been talking about budget issues, or about ways and means to attack social ills; but that is not the case at all. They are not talking about how to attack the lack of affordable housing; they are telling us that there is no need to do anything about it at all. They are not asking housing advocates to moderate their programs, or to cut back; they are—and have been all along—telling us to abandon these efforts altogether. They are not seeking compromise, but total destruction of Federal housing programs. This was made clear from the beginning, when David Stockman appeared before the Subcommittee on Housing to explain the rationale for what later became Gramm-Latta. Perhaps it was too shocking for many to accept his aims for what they were and are; but this year, at last, the budget leaves no room for doubt.

The Reagan administration sees no Federal responsibility for housing, and will not even seek added funding for its own voucher program, which it said would be the market-based substitute for housing production programs, and which its principal mentor, the Heritage Foundation, envisions as a possible entitlement program. It is not, the budget makes clear, a debate about how to meet the nation's housing and community development needs, but whether there is to be a Federal policy to address these needs at all.

Almost exactly four years ago, David Stockman appeared before the Housing Subcommittee and argued that assisted housing programs were not justifiable because they did not serve all of the eligible population; it was unfair, he argued, to provide heavy subsidies for some while others waited in line. His conclusion was that there should be no assisted housing program at all. It therefore should come as no surprise that today, after four years of seeing housing programs slashed beyond any bound of reason, and after four years of seeing the progressive administrative sabotaging of what little was left, the President seeks the utter abandonment of housing programs.

Today, there is in fact no Federal policy on housing and community development. The assisted housing production pipeline is being rapidly emptied, with no replacement in sight. Community development block grants have been cut and frozen for so long that they have become atrophied, not a source of dynamic change. Urban development action grants are threatened; so are many types of revenue bonds; and the so-called enterprise zone is more brave talk than any realistic hope of effective redevelopment.

We face a clear choice: either we continue down the road to the abolition of housing and community development efforts, or we reverse direction. The choice this year is not how much of a Federal housing effort there will be, but whether there will be any effort at all. It is not a choice of how to structure a program, but whether there will be one at all. It is not a choice between housing vouchers and the production of public housing units, but whether there will be any effort at all to provide decent, affordable housing for all Americans.

There are some who believe that the President's budget will be dead on arrival, because it lacks economic reality and political acceptability. Some will be tempted to say that the Senate will reject out of hand the President's attack on housing and community development programs. But in human affairs there is always the element of the unexpected, the trivial, or the eccentric. This year, the Senate's most knowledgeable Republican in housing is preoccupied with other matters. Much to his credit, Senator Garn is training to go on a mission with the space shuttle; unfortunately, this leaves him little time and energy to housing. In the Senate, the President's effort to abandon housing may have more vigor than would be first appear, through simple default.

On the House side, the budget committee is headed by Bill Gray, who has substantial personal experience with assisted housing development. He knows how these programs operate and what they can do. He has worked with the mortgage banking community, and knows what it can do. Likewise, there is the added presence of Chuck Schumer on the Budget Committee. It would be hard to think of a more energetic, imaginative and persuasive housing advocate than Congressman Schumer. The Committee on Banking has, in the past, been able to force housing programs down the throat of both the Senate and White House. We may be able to do so again, but this year it will be harder than ever. This year there is little that the Administration wants, the pressure to cut any and all domestic programs is intense, and there is fear on every side. Whatever we are able to accomplish in housing will be accomplished only if there is a deep and broad public demand for decent housing programs, and for workable community development and renewal programs.

Effective housing advocacy must start at the grass roots, at the community level. It must clearly be understood that Ronald Reagan is not merely talking about killing public housing; he is not talking merely about killing housing subsidies; he is also talking about the effective death of FHA mortgage insurance, about the crippling of the secondary mortgage market, and about the siphoning off of housing credit. The threat is not just to the poor, but to every American who pays rent or is seeking to buy a home, or who hopes to see the neighborhood revitalized. For we are no longer discussing how much programs can be cut and still survive; we are talking about whether they will survive at all. Whether or not they do will depend upon how well the public understands the issue, and that in turn depends upon how well you and I communicate the need.

The fact is that the rate of homeownership is falling, and will fall much more rapidly if the President's program succeeds. The fact is that the stock of affordable low-cost housing is shrinking rapidly, and will shrink much more rapidly if the President succeeds in killing the nation's housing programs. The fact is that community renewal efforts will soon become moribund, if the President has his way.

There are those who say that Calcutta is a city that represents an ideal kind of economic efficiency. You and I associate Calcutta with hardship and desperation, but if you view it through the pure lens of market economics, what you see is a city where almost everyone has achieved as much as skill and energy and determination makes possible; a city where no possible opportunity is overlooked, a city where a kind of Darwinian natural selection takes place. When Ronald Reagan speaks of his glowing city on the hill, he is thinking of a city, not unlike Calcutta, in which the rich are comfortable and need not worry about the plight of the poor, who have been assigned their proper place by the immutable forces of the market. He is thinking about a city where natural selection takes place, with the lucky rising and the unlucky falling, and nothing to interfere with the flow up and down. He is talking about the society of the ant-heap.

I believe that human beings are endowed with the same dignity and right that Jefferson described. The basic value of our society has been that what individuals cannot do for themselves, the community will help. The basic value has been that when communities are overwhelmed and cannot meet the basic needs of the people, the nation will help. The basic value has been that every human being is entitled to a fair chance, to a realistic opportunity, and when need be, a helping hand.

It is no exaggeration to say that the issue this year, not just in housing, but in education, in agriculture, in health care, and in all manner of other issues, is whether we will maintain our commitment to each other as a great community of people working with decency and compassion, or whether we will embrace the soul-lessness of the perfect marketplace, where the privileged have their place and the remainder must fight over the scraps.

In housing, H.R. 1 represents the choice: either this country will reaffirm its commitment to housing and community development, or abandon it. The President says that it should be abandoned. I say that we do so only at the peril as endangering human well being and social stability, not to mention human decency. In 1985, it is time to choose.

COMPARISON OF KEMP-KASTEN FAIR AND SIMPLE TAX WITH OTHER TAX PROPOSALS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP] is recognized for 60 minutes.

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, last week I introduced a new version of the Kemp-Kasten fair and simple tax [FAST] and included a great deal of explanatory material outlining the modifications to our original proposal. Since then, many people have asked how Kemp-Kasten compares with other major tax proposals, such as the Bradley-Gephardt bill and the Treasury proposal, and also how various taxpayers would fare under the Kemp-Kasten plan.

In response, I am including some examples of how taxpayers at various income levels would be treated under current law, Bradley-Gephardt, the Treasury plan, and Kemp-Kasten.

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE FOR THE 99TH CONGRESS

(Mr. DE LA GARZA asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to submit for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD pursuant to the rules of the House a copy of the rules of the Committee on Agriculture which were adopted at the organizational meeting today. The rules were agreed to by a unanimous voice vote.

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

a. Rules of the U.S. House of Representatives.—The Rules of the House shall govern the procedure of the Committee so far as applicable, and the rules of the Committee shall be interpreted in accordance with the Rules of the House except that the motion to recess from day to day, and a motion to dispense with the first reading (in full) of a bill or resolution, if printed copies are available, are nondebatable motions of high privilege in committees and subcommittees. (See Appendix B for the applicable Rules of the U.S. House of Representatives.)

b. Applicability to Subcommittees.—The following rules shall apply to meetings, hearings and other activities of Subcommittees, which are part of the Committee and subject to its authority and direction, only when specifically so stated.

II. COMMITTEE OR SUBCOMMITTEE BUSINESS MEETINGS

a. Regular and Additional Meetings.—The Committee shall meet on the first Tuesday of each month while the Congress is in session. The Committee shall also meet at the call of the Chairman at such other times as he considers to be necessary, subject to advance notice to all Committee members. Insofar as practicable, an agenda for all regular and additional Committee meetings, setting forth all the measures and matters to be considered, shall be furnished each Committee member prior to the meeting. Items may be placed on the agenda by the Chairman or a majority of the Committee. If the Chairman determines that any meeting convened by him need not be held, he shall give all members of the Committee notice to that effect as far in advance of the meeting day as practicable, and no meeting shall be held on such day. See Rule VI. e. for provisions which apply to meetings of Subcommittees.

b. Special Meetings.—If at least three members of the Committee file a written request in the Committee offices that a special meeting be called by the Chairman to consider a specific measure(s) or matter(s), the Staff Director shall immediately notify the Chairman of the filing of such request. If, within three calendar days after the filing of such request, the Chairman does not call the requested special meeting to be held at a time within seven calendar days after the filing of such request, a majority of the members of the Committee may file in the Committee offices their written notice that a special meeting will be held at a specified date and hour to consider a specified measure(s) or matter(s). If such a notice is filed, the Committee shall meet on that date and hour. Immediately upon the filing of such a notice, the Staff Director shall notify all members of the Committee that such special meeting will be held at the specified date and hour to consider the specified measure(s) or matter(s). Only the measure(s) or matter(s) so specified in the meeting notice as filed by the majority of Committee members and transmitted to all

c. Vice Chairman.—The Committee shall, by a majority vote, designate one of its members as Vice Chairman who shall perform such duties as the Chairman may direct in the absence of the Chairman.

d. Presiding Member.—If the Chairman is not present at any Committee meeting or hearing the Vice Chairman or, in his absence, the ranking member of the majority party on the Committee who is present shall preside. If the Chairman is not present at any Subcommittee meeting or hearing, the ranking member of the majority party who is present shall preside.

e. Committee and Subcommittee Meetings Prohibited.—The Committee or any of its Subcommittees may not sit, without special leave, while the House is reading a measure for amendment under the five-minute rule.

f. Open Business Meetings.—Each Committee or Subcommittee meeting for the transaction of business, including the markup of legislation, shall be open to the public except when the Committee or Subcommittee, in open session and with a majority present, determines by rollcall vote that all or part of the remainder of the meeting on that day shall be closed to the public. No person other than members of the Committee or Subcommittee and such congressional staff and departmental representatives as the Committee or Subcommittee may authorize shall be present at any business or markup session which has been closed to the public. This paragraph does not apply to Committee or Subcommittee hearings or to any meeting that, as announced by the Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee, relates solely to internal budget or personnel matters.

g. Records and Rollcalls.—A complete record of all Committee or Subcommittee action shall be kept in the form of written minutes, including a record of the votes on any question as to which a rollcall is demanded. A rollcall vote shall be ordered upon demand by one-fifth of the members present. The record of such action and the results of the rollcall votes during each session of the Congress shall be made available by the Committee, upon request, for public inspection during regular office hours in the Committee offices and upon telephone request. The information so available on rollcall votes shall include a brief description of the amendment, motion, order or other proposition; the name of each member voting for and each member voting against such amendment, motion, order or other proposition; whether such vote was by proxy or in person; and names of those members present by not voting. A stenographic record of a business meeting of the Committee or Subcommittee may be kept and may thereafter be published if the Chairman of the Committee determines there is need for such a record. The proceedings of the Committee or Subcommittee in a closed meeting other than rollcall votes shall not be divulged unless otherwise determined by a majority of the Committee or Subcommittee. See Rule IV.f. for publication of the minutes of meetings.

h. Quorums.—A majority of the members of the Committee or Subcommittee shall constitute a quorum of the Committee or Subcommittee for the purpose of convening meetings, conducting business, and voting on any matter: Provided, That the Chairman of the Committee may determine that one-third of the members of the Committee shall constitute a quorum of the Committee at any meeting for such purpose (other than for the reporting of any measure or recommendation, and voting on the authorization of subpoenas and on the closing of hearings and business meetings to the public) if he gives written notice to that effect to the members prior to the meeting.

i. Proxy Voting.—A member may vote by proxy on any matter before the Committee or Subcommittee other than the issuance of a subpoena pursuant to Rule III. b. The proxy authorization shall be in writing, shall assert that the member is absent on official business or is otherwise unable to be present at the Committee or Subcommittee meetings, shall designate the member who is to execute the proxy authorization and shall be limited to a specific measure or matter and any amendments or motions pertaining thereto. A member may authorize a general proxy only for motions to recess, adjourn, or other procedural matters. Each proxy to be effective shall be signed by the member assigning the vote and shall contain the date and time of day the proxy is signed as well as the date or dates during which it is to be effective. The proxy form required by the Committee or Subcommittee is appended to these rules as Appendix A. In order to be cast in a vote it shall be filed with the Committee or Subcommittee during such vote and must be placed on file with the Staff Director. Proxies shall not be counted toward a quorum.

j. Location of Persons at Meetings.—No person other than a Member of Congress or Committee or Subcommittee staff may walk in or be seated at the rostrum area of the Committee or Subcommittee unless the Chairman or a majority of the Committee or Subcommittee determines otherwise.

k. Consideration of Amendments and Motions.—A member, upon request, may be recognized by the Chairman to address the Committee or Subcommittee at a meeting for not more than five minutes on behalf of an amendment or motion offered by himself or another member, or upon any other matter under consideration, unless he receives unanimous consent to extend the time limit. Every amendment, substitute amendment, amendment to an amendment, or amendment in the nature of a substitute made in Committee or Subcommittee that is substantial as determined by the Chairman shall, upon the demand of any member present, be reduced to writing, and a copy thereof shall be made available to all members present: Provided, That such amendment shall remain pending before the Committee or Subcommittee and may not be voted upon until the requirements of this section have been met.

l. Points of Order.—No point of order, other than a point of order that a quorum is not present, against the hearing or meeting procedures of the Committee or Subcommittee shall be sustained unless it is made in a timely fashion either at the commencement of the hearing or meeting or at the time such occasion for a point or order first occurs.

III. COMMITTEE OR SUBCOMMITTEE HEARINGS

1. Power to Hear.—For the purpose of carrying out any of its functions and duties under House Rules X and XI, the Committee is authorized to sit and hold hearings at any time or place within the United States whether the House is in session, has recessed or has adjourned: [See Rule VI. e. for provisions relating to Subcommittee hearings and meetings.]

b. Announcement of Hearings.—The Chairman of the Committee of Subcommittee shall publicly announce the date, place and subject matter of any hearing to be conducted on any measure or matter at least one week before the commencement of that hearing unless the Committee or Subcommittee or the Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee, after consultation with the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee or Subcommittee, as applicable, determines that there is good cause to begin such hearing at an earlier date, in which case the announcement of the hearing shall be made by the Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee at the earliest possible date. The Staff Director shall notify the Daily Digest Clerk of the Congressional Record as soon as possible after such public announcement has been made and enter the announcement into the Committee scheduling service of the House Information Systems.

c. Power to Subpoena.—For the purpose of carrying out any of its functions and duties under House Rules X and XI, the Committee is authorized to require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memoranda, papers, and documents as it deems necessary. A subpoena may be authorized and issued in the conduct of any investigation or series of investigations or activities by the Committee or by a Subcommittee when authorized by a rollcall vote of the majority of the members of the Committee, a majority being present, except that no proxies may be used to vote on the authorization and issuance of such a subpoena. Authorized subpoenas shall be signed by the Chairman or the Vice Chairman of the Committee or by any other member the Committee may designate. Notice of a meeting to consider a motion to authorize and issue a subpoena shall be given to all members of the full Committee by 5 p.m., of the day preceding the day of such meeting. Compliance with a Committee or Subcommittee issued subpoena may be enforced only as authorized or directed by the House.

d. Scheduling of Hearings and Witnesses.—Except as otherwise provided in this paragraph, the scheduling of hearings and witnesses and determination of the time allowed for the presentation of testimony and interrogation shall be at the discretion of the Chairman or a majority of the Committee or Subcommittee. Whenever any hearing is conducted by the Committee or Subcommittee upon any measure or matter, the Committee's or Subcommittee's minority party members shall be entitled, upon request by a majority of them to the Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee before the completion of the hearing, to call witnesses selected by them to testify with respect to that measure or matter during at least one day of hearing.

e. Witnesses' Statements in Advance.—Each witness who is to appear before the Committee or Subcommittee shall, insofar as practicable, file with the Staff Director a written statement of the witness' prepared testimony at least two working days in advance of the witness' appearance in order to permit the testimony to be distributed to and reviewed in advance by Committee or Subcommittee members Witnesses shall provide sufficient copies of their statement for distribution to Committee or Subcommittee members, staff and the news media. The Committee or Subcommittee staff shall distribute such written statements to all members of the Committee or Subcommittees as soon as they are received as well as any official reports from departments and agencies on such subject matter.

f. Testimony of Witnesses.—The Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee or any member designated by him may administer an oath to any witness. Each witness who has been subpoenaed, upon the completion of the witness' testimony, may report in person or in writing to the Staff Director and sign appropriate vouchers for travel allowances and attendance fees. All witnesses may be limited in their oral presentations to brief summaries of their statements within the time allotted to them, at the discretion of the Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee in light of the nature of the witness and the length of time available.

g. Questioning of Witnesses.—Committee or Subcommittee members may question witnesses only when they have been recognized by the Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee for that purpose. Each member so recognized shall be limited to questioning a witness (or panel of witnesses) for five minutes until such time as each member of the Committee or Subcommittee who so desires has had an opportunity to question the witness (or panel of witnesses) for five minutes, and thereafter, the Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee may limit the time of further questioning after giving due consideration to the importance of the subject matter and the length of time available. All questions put to witnesses shall be germane to the measure or matter under consideration. Unless the Chairman or a majority of the Committee or Subcommittee determines otherwise, no person shall interrogate witnesses other than members and Committee or Subcommittee staff.

h. Open Hearings.—Each hearing conducted by the Committee or Subcommittee shall be open to the public except when the Committee or Subcommittee, in open session and with a majority present, determines by rollcall vote that all or part of the remainder of that hearing on that day shall be closed to the public because disclosure of testimony, evidence, or other matters to be considered would endanger the national security or would violate any law or rule of the House of Representatives: Provided, however, That the Committee or Subcommittee may, by the same procedure, vote to close one subsequent day of hearing. Notwithstanding the requirements of the preceding sentence, a majority of those present, there being in attendance the requisite number required under the rules of the Committee to be present for the purpose of taking testimony (1) may vote to close the hearing for the sole purpose of discussing whether testimony or evidence to be received would endanger the national security or violate Rule III. k. or (2) may vote to close the hearing, as provided in Rule III. k. In any event, no member may be excluded from nonparticipatory attendance at any hearing unless the House shall by majority vote authorize the Committee or Subcommittee, for purposes of a particular series of hearings on a particular article of legislation or on a particular subject of investigation, to close its meetings to members by means of the above procedure.

i. Quorum.—The quorum for taking testimony and receiving evidence shall be two members of the Committee or Subcommittee.

j. Record of Hearing.—An accurate stenographic record shall be kept of all testimony taken at public hearings. Any public witness may, during Committee office hours in the Committee offices and within two weeks of the close of hearings, examine the transcript of his or her own testimony and make such grammatical or technical changes as will not substantially alter the nature of testimony given. Members of the Committee or Subcommittee shall receive copies of transcripts for their prompt review and correction for return to the Committee. The Chairman of the Committee may order the printing of a hearing record without the corrections of any member or witness if he determines that such member or witness has been afforded a reasonable time in which to make such corrections and further delay would seriously impede the consideration of the legislative action which is the subject of the hearing. The record of a hearing closes ten calendar days after the last oral testimony, unless the Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee otherwise determines. Any person requesting to file a statement for the record of a hearing must so request before the hearing concludes and must file the statement before the record closes. No written statement becomes part of the record and thus publicly available until such time as it has been approved by the Chairman of the Committee or any Committee staff he designates, and the Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee or his designee may reject any statement in light of its length or its tendency to defame, degrade, or incriminate any person.

k. Investigative Hearings.—The Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee at an investigative hearing shall announce in an opening statement the subject of the investigation. A copy of the Committee rules (and the applicable provision of the House Rules set forth in Appendix B) shall be made available to each witness. Witnesses at investigative hearings may be accomplished by their own counsel for the purpose of advising them concerning their constitutional rights. The Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee may punish breaches of order and decorum, and of professional ethics on the part of counsel, by censure and exclusion from the hearings, but only a the full Committee may cite the offender to the House for contempt. Whenever it is asserted that the evidence or testimony at an investigatory hearing may tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate any person—

(1) such testimony or evidence shall be presented in executive session, notwithstanding the provisions of Rule III. h., if by a majority of these present, there being in attendance the requisite number required under the rules of the Committee to be present for the purpose of taking testimony, the Committeee or Subcommittee determines that such evidence or testimony may tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate any person;

(2) the Committee or Subcommittee shall proceed to receive such testimony in open session only if a majority of the members of the Committee or Subcommittee, a majority being present, determine that such evidence or testimony will not tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate any person. In either case the Committee or Subcommittee shall afford such person an opportunity voluntarily to appear as a witness; and the Committee or Subcommittee shall receive and the Committee shall dispose of requests from such person to subpoena additional witnesses.

Except as provided herein, the Chairman shall receive and the Committee shall dispose of requests to subpoena additional witnesses. No evidence or testimony taken in executive session may be released or used in public sessions without the consent of the Committee or Subcommittee. In the discretion of the Committee or Subcommittee, witnesses may submit brief and pertinent sworn statements in writing for inclusion in the record. The Committee or Subcommittee is the sole judge of the pertinency of testimony and evidence adduced at its hearings. A witness may obtain a transcript copy of his testimony given at a public session or, if given at an executive session, when authorized by the Committee or Subcommittee.

1. Broadcasting and Photography.—Television, film making and live radio broadcasting of all or part of any Committee hearing or meeting shall be permitted only when the Committee by a majority vote agrees or, if the Committee cannot be polled in a timely manner, when approved by the Chairman of the Committee after consultation with the Ranking Minority Member. Except as otherwise determined by the Committee, television, film making and live radic broadcasting of all or part of any Subcommittee hearing or meeting shall be permitted only when the Subcommittee by a majority vote agrees or, if the Subcommittee cannot be polled in a timely manner, when approved by the Chairman of the Committee or the Chairman of the Subcommittee after consultation with the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee or Subcommittee. Radio broadcasting that is not live and still photography are permitted of any Committee or Subcommittee meeting or hearing unless otherwise determined by the Chairman of the Committee or applicable Subcommittee after consultation with the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee or Subcommittee: Provided, That when such radio broadcasting is conducted, written notice to that effect shall be placed on the desk of each Member. Each committee or subcommittee chairman shall determine, in his or her discretion, the number of television and still cameras permitted in a hearing or meeting room. Any broadcasting, electronic recording, film making, and/or still photography of all or part of a hearing or meeting shall be subject to the provisions of House Rule XI. 3. (f) which appear in Appendix B.

IV. THE REPORTING OF BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

a. Filing of Reports.—The Chairman shall report or cause to be reported promptly to the House any bill or resolution approved by the Committee and shall take or cause to be taken all necessary steps to bring said bill or resolution to a vote. A Committee report on any bill or resolution approved by the Committee shall be filed within seven calendar days (not counting days on which the House is not in session) after the day on which there has been filed with the Staff Director of the Committee a written request, signed by a majority of the Committee, for the reporting of that bill or resolution. The Staff Director of the Committee shall notify the Chairman immediately when such a request is filed.

b. Content of Reports.—Each Committee report on any bill or resolution approved by the Committee shall include as separately identified sections:

(1) a statement of the intent or purpose of the bill or resolution;

(2) a statement describing the need for such bill or resolution;

(3) the results of the rollcall vote on the motion to report such bill or resolution, including the total number of votes cast for and total number of votes cast against said reporting;

(4) the detailed statement described in section 308(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 if the bill or resolution provides new budget authority (other than continuing appropriations) or new or increased tax expenditures;

(5) the estimate of costs and comparison of such estimates, if any, prepared by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office in connection with such bill or resolution pursuant to section 403 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 and submitted in timely fashion to the Committee;

(6) any oversight findings and recommendations made by the Committee or the Committee on Government Operations or both to the extent such were available during the Committee's deliberations on the bill or resolution;

(7) a detailed analytical statement as to whether the enactment of such bill or joint resolution into law may have an inflationary impact on prices and costs in the operation of the national economy;

(8) an estimate of the costs which would be incurred in carrying out such bill or joint resolution in the fiscal year in which it is reported and for its authorized duration for each of the five fiscal years following the fiscal year of reporting, whichever period is less, together with a comparison of these estimates with those made and submitted to the Committee by any Government agency (the provisions of this clause do not apply if a cost estimate and comparison prepared by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office under section 403 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 has been timely submitted prior to the filing of the report and included in the report);

(9) the changes in existing law (if any) shown in accordance with Rule XIII, clause 3, of the House Rules;

(10) the determination required pursuant to section 5(a) of Public Law 92-463, if the legislation reported establishes or authorizes the establishment of an advisory committee; and

(11) such other matter as the Chairman of the Committee determines to be useful for public understanding of the intent and effect of the bill or resolution.

c. Supplemental, Minority, or Additional Views.—If, at the time of approval of any measure or matter by the Committee, any member of the Committee gives notice of intention to file supplemental, minority, or additional views, that member shall be entitled to not less than three calendar days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) in which to file such views, in writing and signed by that member, with the Staff Director of the Committee. All such views so filed by one or more members of the Committee shall be included within, and shall be a part of, the report filed by the Committee with respect to that measure or matter. The report of the Committee upon that measure or matter shall be printed in a single volume which shall:

(1) include all supplemental, minority, or additional views which have been submitted by the time of the filing of the report; and

(2) bear upon its cover a recital that any such supplmental, minority, or additional views (and any material submitted under subdivisions (C) and (D) of paragraph (1)(3) of House Rule XI, clause 2) are included as part of the report.

This shall not preclude the immediate filing or printing of a Committee report unless timely request for the opportunity to file supplement, minority, or additional views has been made as provided by this subparagraph or the filing by the Committee of any supplemental report upon any bill or resolution which may be required for the correction of any technical error in a previous report made by the Committee upon the bill or resolution.

d. Availability of hearing.—If hearings have been held on any reported bill or resolution, the Committee shall make every reasonable effort to have such hearings printed and available for distribution to the Members of the House prior to the consideration of such bill or resolution by the House.

e. Committee Prints.—All Committee or Subcommittee prints or other Committee or Subcommittee documents, other than reports or prints of bill, that are prepared for public distribution shall be approved by the Chairman of the Committee or the Committee prior to public distribution.

f. Publication of Minutes.—The Chairman of the Committee, in consultation with the Ranking Minority Member, shall cause to be published as a Committee Print on a periodic basis (and insofar as practicable on a semiannual basis) the minutes of all business meetings and hearings of the Committee and any of its Subcommittees and such minutes shall include a record of the attendance of members, all recorded votes and the action on all amendments and motions relating to legislation.

V. OTHER COMMITTEE ACTIVITIES

a. Annual Appropriations.—The Committee shall, in its consideration of all bills and joint resolutions of a public character within its jurisdiction, insure that appropriations for continuing programs and activities of the Federal Government and the District of Columbia government will be made annually to the maximum extent feasible and consistent with the nature, requirements, and objectives of the programs and activities involved. The Committee shall review, from time to time, each continuing program within its jurisdiction for which appropriations are not made annually in order to ascertain whether such program could be modified so that appropriations therefor would be made annually.

b. Budget Act Compliance: March 15 (See Appendix C).—The Committee shall, on or before March 15 of each year, submit to the Committee on the Budget (1) its views and estimates with respect to all matters to be set forth in the concurrent resolution on the budget for the ensuing fiscal year which are within its jurisdiction or functions, and (2) an estimate of the total amounts of new budget authority, and budget outlays resulting therefrom, to be provided or authorized in all bills and resolutions within its jurisdiction which it intends to be effective during that fiscal year.

c. Budget Act Compliance: Subdivision of Allocations (See Appendix C).—As soon as practicable after a concurrent resolution on the budget for any fiscal year is agreed to, the Committee (after consulting with the appropriate committee or committees of the Senate) shall subdivide any allocations made to it in the joint explanatory statement accompanying the conference report on such resolutions, and promptly report such subdivisions to the House, in the manner provided by section 302 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

d. Budget Act Compliance: Recommended Changes (See Appendix C).—Whenever the Committee is directed in a concurrent resolution on the budget to determine and recommend changes in laws, bills, or resolutions under the reconciliation process, it shall promptly make such determination and recommendations, and report a reconciliation bill or resolution (or both) to the House or submit such recommendations to the Committee on the Budget, in accordance with the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

e. Conference Committees.—Whenever in the legislative process it becomes necessary to appoint conferees, the Chairman shall determine the number of conferees he deems most suitable and then recommend to the Speaker as conferees, in keeping with the number to be chosen, the names of those members of the Committee who were primarily responsible for the legislation and, to the fullest extent feasible, those members of the Committee who were the principal proponents of the major provisions of the bill as it passed the House and such other Committee members of the majority party as the Chairman may designate in consultation with the members of the majority party. Such recommendations shall provide a ratio of majority party members to minority party members no less favorable to the majority party than the ratio of majority members to minority party members on the Committee. In making recommendations of minority party members as conferees, the Chairman shall consult with the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee.

f. Committee Records.—All Committee or Subcommittee hearings, records, data, charts, and files shall be kept separate and distinct from the congressional office records of the member serving as Chairman, and such records shall be the property of the House with all Members of the House having access thereto. The Staff Director shall promptly notify the Chairman and Ranking Minority Member of any request for access to such records.

VI. SUBCOMMITTEES

a. Number and Composition.—There shall be such Subcommittees as specified in clause b of this rule each of which shall be composed of the number of members set forth in such clause, including ex officio members.[1] The Chairman may create additional Subcommittees of an ad hoc nature as he determines to be appropriate.

b. Jurisdiction.—The Subcommittees shall have the following general jurisdiction and number of members.

Commodity subcommittees

Cotton, Rice, and Sugar (18 members, 11 majority and 7 minority).—Cotton, cottonseed, rice, and sugar matters, generally.

Livestock, Dairy, and Poultry (18 members, 11 majority and 7 minority).—Livestock, dairy, poultry, and bees, generally.

Tobacco and Peanuts (15 members, 9 majority and 6 minority).—Tobacco and peanut matters, generally.

Wheat, Soybeans, and Feed Grains (20 members, 12 majority and 8 minority).—Wheat, soybeans, feed grains, oilseeds not otherwise assigned, dry beans, peas, and lentils, generally.

Operational subcommittees

Conservation, Credit, and Rural Development: (18 members, 11 majority and 7 minority).—Soil and water conservation, small watershed program, commodity futures, agricultural credit and rural development matters, generally.

[1] The Chairman and Ranking Minority Member of the Committee (See paragraph d. of this Rule).

Department Operations, Research, and Foreign Agriculture (15 members, 9 majority and 6 minority).—Foreign agricultural programs, agency review and analysis, research, and pesticides, generally.

Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations, and Nutrition (13 members, 8 majority and 5 minority).—Marketing orders, domestic marketing, food stamps, nutrition, and consumer programs, generally.

Forests, Family Farms, and Energy (15 members, 9 majority and 6 minority).—Family farming, forestry, and energy matters, generally.

c. Referral of Legislation.—In the case of any measure or matter not specifically described above, or which includes the jurisdiction of two or more Subcommittees, the Chairman may, unless the Committee by a majority vote decides otherwise, refer such measure or matter simultaneously to two or more Subcommittees for concurrent consideration or for consideration in sequence (subject to appropriate time limitations in the case of any Subcommittee), or divide the matter into two or more parts reflecting different subjects and jurisdiction and refer each part to a different Subcommittee, or refer the matter to an ad hoc Subcommittee appointed by him for the specific purpose of considering that matter and reporting to the Committee thereon, or make such other provisions as may be considered appropriate. The Chairman, with the approval of a majority of the Committee, shall have authority to discharge a Subcommittee from further consideration of any bill, resolution, or other matter referred thereto and have such bill, resolution or other matter considered by the Committee. All legislation and other matters considered by the Committee. All legislation and other matters referred to the Committee shall be referred to all Subcommittees of appropriate jurisdiction within two weeks unless, by majority vote of the members of the Committee, consideration is to be by the Committee.

d. Service on Subcommittees.—The Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member shall serve as ex officio members of all Subcommittees and shall have the right to vote on all matters before such Subcommittees, but shall not be counted for the purpose of establishing a quorum. Any member of the Committee may have the privilege of sitting with any Subcommittee during its hearings or deliberations and participate therein, but shall not have authority to vote on any matter, nor be counted present for the purpose of a quorum for any Subcommittee action, nor, except as the Subcommittee Chairman or a majority of the Subcommittee may permit, particpate in questioning of witnesses under the five-minute rule, nor raise points of order unless such member is a member of such Subcommittee.

e. Subcommittee Hearings and Meetings.—Each Subcommittee is authorized to meet, hold hearings, receive evidence, and report to the Committee on all matters referred to it or under its jurisdiction. Subcommittee Chairmen shall set dates for hearings and meetings of their Subcommittees, after consultation with the Chairman of the Committee and one another, with a view toward avoiding simultaneous scheduling of Committee and Subcommittee meetings or hearings whenever possible. Notice of all such meetings shall be given to the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee by the Staff Director. No Subcommittee shall hold meetings or hearings outside of the House unless permission to do so is granted by the Chairman, or a majority, of the Committee. If a vacancy should occur in a Subcommittee chairmanship, the Chairman of the Committee may set the dates for hearings and meetings of the Subcommittee during the period between the date of the vacancy and the date the vacancy is filled. The provisions of Rule II regarding notice and agenda of Committee meetings and of Rule II. b. regarding special meetings shall apply as well to Subcommittee meetings.

f. Subcommittee Action.—Any bill, resolution, recommendation or other matter ordered reported to the Committee by a Subcommittee shall be promptly reported by the Subcommittee Chairman or any Subcommittee member authorized to do so by the Subcommittee. Upon receipt of such report, the Staff Director shall promptly advise all members of the Committee of the Subcommittee action. The Committee shall not consider any matters reported by Subcommittees until two calendar days have elapsed from the date of reporting, unless the Chairman or a majority of the Committee determines otherwise.

g. Subcommittee Investigations.—Except for the Subcommittee on Department Operations, Research, and Foreign Agriculture, no investigation shall be initiated by a Subcommittee without the approval of the Chairman of the Committee or a majority of the Committee.

VII. COMMITTEE BUDGET, STAFF, AND TRAVEL

a. Committee Budget.—The Chairman, in consultation with the majority members of the Committee, shall for each session of the Congress prepare a preliminary budget. Such budget shall include necessary amounts for staff personnel, travel, investigation, and other expenses of the Committee and Subcommittees thereof. After consultation with the Ranking Minority Member, the Chairman shall include an amount budgeted to minority members for staff under their direction and supervision. Thereafter, the Chairman shall combine such proposals into a consolidated Committee budget, and shall take whatever action is necessary to have such budget duly authorized by the House.

b. Committee Staff.—The staff of the Committee shall perform such duties as are authorized by law and shall be under the general supervision and direction of the Chairman. Staff assigned to each Subcommittee shall perform such duties as are authorized by law and shall be under the general supervision and direction of the Chairman of the Committee and the Chairman of the Subcommittee. Committee members seeking assistance from the staff shall make their requests through the Chairman or Ranking Minority Member. The Chairman shall insure that each Subcommittee is adequately funded and staffed to discharge its responsibilities.

c. Committee Travel.—Funds authorized for the Committee under clause 5 of House Rule XI are for expenses incurred in the Committee's activities within the United States; however, local currencies owned by the United States shall be made available to the Committee and its employees engaged in carrying out their official duties outside the United States, its territories or possessions. No appropriated funds shall be expended for the purpose of defraying expenses of members of the Committee or its employees in any country where local currencies are available for this purpose; and the following conditions shall apply with respect to their use of such currencies;

(1) No member or employee of the Committee shall receive or expend local currencies for subsistence in any country at a rate in excess of the maximum per diem rate set forth in applicable Federal law; and

(2) Each member of employee of the Committee shall make an itemized report to the Chairman within 60 days following the completion of travel showing the dates each country was visited, the amount of per diem furnished, the cost of transportation furnished, any funds expended for any other official purpose, and shall summarize in these categories the total foreign currencies and/or appropriated funds expended. All such individual reports shall be filed by the Chairman with the Committee on House Administration and shall be open to public inspection.

VIII. AMENDMENT OF RULES

These rules may be modified, amended, or repealed, by a majority vote of the Committee, provided that two legislative days written notice of the proposed change has been provided each member of the Committee prior to the meeting date on which such changes are to be discussed and voted upon.●

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TERRORISM STRIKES AGAIN IN EUROPE

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD
OF MICHIGAN

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, now more than ever, our Government must continue to do all that it can to counter the growing threat of terrorism in the world. Again, the specter of mindless terrorism is raising its ugly head in Europe.

Leftist terrorists groups have launched a series of attacks on NATO and American targets in Italy, Germany, Belgium, and France. NATO targets, defense firms, and government facilities have been hit and some have been damaged.

For the first time, the French terrorist group "Direct Action" and the German group "Red Army Faction" recently announced their fusion into one group. The newly formed group has declared war against NATO and U.S. influence in Europe.

The level of terrorist violence has also escalated. French Gen. Rene Audran was shot and killed last week as he returned home from work. The general was a high-ranking French Defense Ministry official. Direct Action claimed responsibility for the crime. Never before has the terrorist group resorted to murder. In past years, their attacks have been mostly symbolic. Just this week, a leftist terrorist group fired mortar rounds at NATO warships anchored in Lisbon harbor. The Popular Forces of April 25, an extremist Communist group, took credit for the unsuccessful attack. The same group mortared the U.S. Embassy in Lisbon in November, and attacked NATO's Iberian headquarters in Portugal a month later. Italian antiterrorist forces foiled an Islamic Jihad plan to attack the American Embassy in Rome in recent months.

Terrorist groups in Europe are also increasing their level of cooperation. According to available intelligence, there are links between Direct Action and Basque terrorists, as well as contact between Direct Action and the Fighting Communist cells, a new leftist terrorist group from Belgium.

Terrorism is not confined to Western Europe. Last year brought a number of devastating terrorist attacks in the Middle East, and terrorist operations continue in Central and South America. Already, our Government is making plans to increase security here in the United States in anticipation of possible terrorist activities in Washington and in other cities.

I commend the administration for its continuing support of antiterrorism legislation, and its strong interest in this critical issue. During the last session, the Congress passed H.R. 6311 giving over $350 million to the Department of State for antiterrorism programs and physical security projects at our missions around the world. Much more must be done, both in the area of enhancing Embassy security and in improving our intelligence collecting capabilities.

Terrorism is a form of political war. It is low level warfare directed against the United States and other democracies in the West. As long as the United States represents certain values in the world, there will be groups which will seek to intimidate us and force us to change our policies by directing violence at us and at our interests. Our battle against terrorism has just begun with the first step in a journey of many, many miles. Finding the courage to speak out about terrorism is surely the first step toward the defeat of those who would destroy our freedom and our world.

I strongly commend the following article on terrorism in Europe from the Christian Science Monitor to my colleagues in the Congress.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Jan. 25, 1985]

EUROTERRORISM IN THE 1980'S—UNITED STATES AND W. EUROPEAN MILITARY, POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS BECOME TARGETS FOR NEW WAVE OF TERRORIST ATTACKS

(By Gary Yerkey)

BRUSSELS.—Urban terrorism has returned to Western Europe, with its perpetrators this time taking aim at new targets and pledging to strengthen cross-border cooperation.

National government and NATO officials are not panicking. "We'll cope," says one investigator here.

But concern clearly runs deep in government and military circles, as well as among the public at large.

Today's terrorists, mostly claiming to fight for leftist causes, have struck where their forerunners caused havoc a decade ago, mainly in West Germany and Italy. But they have also hit out in countries previously spared organized terror, such as France and Belgium.

The newest target: the Western world's defense community, specifically installations, personnel, and suppliers connected with the Brussels-based North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The number of attacks against NATO targets has increased dramatically over the past four months. Earlier this month, two well-known guerrilla groups—Direct Action in France and the Red Army Faction (Baader-Meinhof Gang) in West Germany—announced that they were forming a political-military front in Western Europe with NATO as its main target.

This disturbing sign of stepped-up cooperation among terrorist groups in different countries was followed by news this week that the explosives used by Direct Action in a failed attack in Paris last summer were of the same type as those employed by the Red Army Faction in the attempted bombing of a NATO officers' school in West Germany on Dec. 18.

This same type of explosive had also been used in six bomb attacks against NATO fuel pipelines in Belgium nine days earlier by the newest self-proclaimed leftist group to appear on the terrorist scene, the Fighting Communist Cells. All the explosives were reportedly stolen in southern Belgium last June.

"It's the first piece of concrete evidence we've had in a long time that the different groups are working together," says one investigator. He notes that previous reports of links between various guerrilla groups in Western Europe were based more on suspicion than fact.

New evidence of closer links also came this month when the Fighting Communist Cells, which launched a series of bomb attacks against NATO-related targets in Belgium last October, said in a communiqué:

"We dedicate our attack [against the administrative headquarters of the US military in Belgium on Jan. 15] to the fighters of the Red Army Faction who struggle today in a collective hunger strike against their conditions of detention/extermination in special prisons."

Nearly 40 suspected and convicted Red Army Faction (RAF) terrorists have been on hunger strike in West German jails since last month.

Since mid-December more than 40 bomb and arson incidents have been investigated by West German police—at least 20 of them strongly believed to have been the work of the RAF, including seven against US installations. The rest were directed at French diplomatic buildings, British barracks, and large West German industrial plants.

Security authorities reportedly have tightened security around likely human targets such as senior NATO officers, judges, lawyers, and leading businessmen.

Unlike the terrorist groups of the 1970s, however, the born-again violence-wreakers of the mid-1980s so far have been content for the most part to wreck property and to leave human beings alone. The RAF's predecessor, the Baader-Mainhof Gang, claimed responsibility for killing a number of victims, including West German business leader Hanns-Martin Schleyer and Dresdner Bank chief Jurgen Ponto.

The exception to the current tendency to avoid killing people is Italy, where attacks against human life by both the extreme left and extreme right have continued almost unabated since the days of the now-infamous Red Brigades in the late 1960s and 1970s.

France's Direct Action group came to prominence in 1980 with a series of bomb attacks against government buildings. It has also struck out against rightists and Israelis.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Last year, Direct Action indicated that it could be making a change in tactics when it tried (unsuccessfully) to bomb the Paris offices of the Western European Union (WEU)—a long-moribund organization of several European countries now being brought to life as a forum for discussing the strengthening of West European defense.

Announcing the formation of a joint "political-military front" earlier this month, the RAF and Direct Action said specifically that they had joined forces in order to more effectively fight "NATO's new politics" and other Western defense-related activities, including the deployment of new US cruise and Pershing II nuclear missiles in Western Europe.

From the start, the Fighting Communist Cells, which has carried out bomb attacks in Belgium on nine separate occasions since it first became known last October, has left no doubt that its main goal would be to terrorize NATO-related targets.

It singled out Belgium for an "armed political-military struggle." It said this was because Belgium has a "limited but central place" in the "imperialist military machine," as evidenced by NATO's decision to locate both its political and military headquarters on Belgian soil.

Until its latest attack, on Jan. 15, the Belgian group avoided tactics such as kidnappings and bombings, which have the potential of injuring or killing human beings. All its work was done in pre-dawn hours or far from populated areas. But now the Fighting Communist Cells has vowed to change that.

A communiqué signed by the group and found after the Jan. 15 bombing of the administrative headquarters of the US military in Brussels warned that future actions could "kill Yankee military and their accomplices. . . . Human life is not an absolute in itself, a mysterious value. It holds no sacred character for us."

The group's latest bombing, in fact, which caused an estimated $500,000 in property damage, did slightly injure a US military policeman guarding the building and appeared calculated to kill him and his fellow guard on duty the night of the bombing.

We're taking this new threat very seriously, said a Belgian Justice Ministry official.

The difficulty, if not impossibility, of tracking down small bands of terrorists who strike and then disappear underground until their next attack has been underscored by Belgium's failure to turn up concrete leads (except those stolen explosives used by the Fighting Communist Cells and groups in France and West Germany) since the Belgian group surfaced for the first time nearly four months ago.

Even NATO security officials here have become impatient with the Belgian police, who protect the perimeter of the organization's sprawling headquarters just outside Brussels.

"We'd feel a little more comfortable if we had more information," said one official.

After the Fighting Communist Cells' first bombing last October, the Belgian Justice Ministry beefed up the country's antiterrorist squad. Some 250 policemen will be hired this year to help fight terrorism. But Justice Minister Jean Gol has been left empty-handed in the struggle, issuing statements calling for greater cooperation among European countries to fight terrorism but having little to show as an example of how to do it.

A grim reminder that terrorism in Western Europe is not limited to left-wing, or even right-wing, groups but can cover the whole spectrum of causes and ideas—anti-British (IRA), anti-Semitic, anti-Palestinian, anti-Spanish (Basques), anti-Turk (Armenians)—came earlier this month when Belgium's intelligence services learned that a possible suicide bomb attack was being planned by the Islamic fundamentalist group, Islamic Jihad, against undisclosed targets in Belgium.

Some 1,500 police were put on full alert for nearly a week, and security was tightened at Western and some Middle Eastern embassies, NATO headquarters, and most government installations.

The plot, which was apparently foiled, was also a reminder that isolated acts of terrorism can be prevented.

Perhaps the best example of that came only last month when Swiss and Italian antiterrorist squads joined forces to squash a plan to destroy the US Embassy in Rome—a plot also reportedly being hatched by the Islamic Jihad.

The combined counter-terrorist operation began when Swiss police found several explosive devices in the suitcase of a Lebanese national changing planes in Zurich on his way to Rome.

The Swiss police alerted the Italian secret service. As a result, in a predawn raid on two apartments northwest of Rome, the Italian security services were able to round up seven young Lebanese students.

US officials found out about the plot only after the raid had taken place. Later, the American Ambassador to Italy, Maxwell Rabb, paid a call on Rome's police chief to express his gratitude. "Your country," he said, "has again demonstrated that it is in the vanguard of the fight against subversive elements that stain the world with blood."

HOMEMAKER EQUITY ACT

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing the Homemakers Equity Act—legislation to provide the same tax treatment to homemakers for contributions to an individual retirement account that is now available under current law to wage earners. Currently, our tax laws are biased against homemakers who wish to ensure that they will have sufficient funds to live their retirement years with the dignity and self-respect which is rightfully theirs. A marriage is both a social and economic partnership and this bill will allow homemakers the economic recognition they deserve in anticipation of their retirement years.

Presently, workers outside the home are permitted to make tax-deductible contributions of 100 percent of compensation up to $2,000 each year to an IRA. Accordingly, if a married individual and his spouse each receive compensation during a year, each may make separate deductible contributions to his or her IRA of up to 100 percent of compensation up to $2,000 each year. If an individual receives no compensation during a year, the individual generally is not allowed to make a deductible IRA contribution for such year. A special rule applies to married couples with only one paid worker. It is referred to as a "spousal IRA." The worker may establish an IRA for the nonearner spouse, and make a maximum combined contribution of $2,250 to the two IRA's—the worker's and the spouse's. The amount may be divided among the IRA's in any manner, but no more than $2,000 may be placed in either IRA.

The existing rules governing IRA's are unfair to homemakers who have not worked outside the home or who have temporarily interrupted their careers or who have chosen to work part-time. The relatively minor allowances for a spousal IRA fail to recognize the important economic contributions made by non-wage-earning spouses. Moreover, they are inconsistent with other rules of current law under which married couples are treated as an economic and taxpaying unit. A husband and wife who both work and earn $10,000 each, for example, can make aggregate IRA contributions of $4,000 under current law. A couple with the same joint income of $20,000, all of it earned by one spouse, can make aggregate IRA contributions of only $2,250. A third couple, with $20,000 of joint income, but with one spouse earning only $200, is limited even further to a $2,200 aggregate IRA contribution. These disparate results are inconsistent with the general principle of requiring similar tax treatment of similarly situated taxpayers.

In addition to considerations of simple fairness, the Homemakers Equity Act merits congressional support for related compelling reasons. The legislation will contribute to an increase in the national pool of savings and encourage individuals to make adequate provisions for their retirement security. Incentives for savings are crucial for lowering interest rates, increasing capital formation and promoting productivity and economic growth.

Furthermore, financial security in retirement continues to be difficult to achieve for homemakers. It is noteworthy that the poorest members in our society are older women. IRA's are not and should not become a replacement for public and private pension programs. For homemakers, however, they offer an important way to ensure supplementary financial security in retirement. In this respect, IRA tax exemptions for homemakers are even more crucial than they are for wage earners.

While it would be preferable to redress the inequitable treatment of homemakers by immediately raising the aggregate limit to $4,000 this year, the historic Federal budget deficit calls for a more prudent phase-in. This legislation would phase in the increase over a 7-year period beginning in 1986 according to the following schedule:

For the taxable years beginning in:	The applicable amount is:
1986 and 1987	$2,750
1988 and 1989	3,250
1990 and 1991	3,750
1992 and thereafter	4,000

I hope the House will give the Homemakers Equity Act full and timely consideration. It is time to give the American homemaker equitable treatment in providing for financial security in retirement.●

AN OVERVIEW OF THE 1985 FARM BILL, PART 1—IS THERE STILL ROOM FOR THE AMERICAN DREAM?

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, one of our most cherished national hymns begins, "Oh beautiful for spacious skies, for amber waves of grain; For purple mountains' majesty, above the fruited plains * * *." The mere mention of this phrase cannot help but produce an image of farmers harvesting their crops in the fall as one soars high above the ground.

Yet, until recently, it had been a long time since any of us truly felt the meaning of these inspirational words. Years of Vietnam, Watergate, stagflation, and hostage crises had numbed our senses to the greatness which is America.

The events of the last 4 years have done much to reverse the national malaise of the 1970's and create a national renaissance in its place. As a whole, Americans are feeling good about themselves again.

Perhaps the most significant of the changes has occurred in our general economy where, by working together, in 4 short years we have been able to reduce inflation to its lowest levels in 20 years, cut the prime interest rate in half, and produce the single largest annual increase in GNP in 30 years.

Regrettably, this recovery has not been consistent throughout the various sectors of our economy. In fact, for most American farmers—be they dairy, livestock, or cash crop farmers—the economic situation is getting worse, not better. Total farm debt now exceeds $200 billion.

For those farmers with debt to asset ratios in excess of 70 percent, it is simply too late. For others with debt asset ratios of between 40 and 70 percent, it may only be a matter of time unless a dramatic turnaround occurs. Thus, some States face losing between 10 and 20 percent of their farm population to liquidation in the next 5 years unless we act—and act immediately.

The crisis facing American agriculture is not new in 1985—it has been with us ever since the 1980 grain embargo.

The decade of the 1970's was a time of high inflation. That inflation led to increased land values as real estate was used as a hedge against inflation. As a result, farmers watched their net worth accelerate because of outside forces. As net worth increased, credit became easier to obtain and many farmers expanded their operations in response to the nationwide call to plant fence row to fence row.

This brief boom in agriculture ended abruptly when President Carter imposed a grain embargo on the Russians. Not only did American farmers lose Russian sales, but our reputation as a reliable supplier was damaged. At the same time, competitors in the Southern Hemisphere prospered and took over our markets.

As a result, our agricultural economy was plagued with huge commodity surpluses and low prices. And, with an incredible sense of timing, interest rates soared higher than at any previous time in history. This meant that net income was reduced not only by low prices, but by increased costs as well.

After 5 years, major newspapers and periodicals have finally realized that those of us who represent the 3 percent of the American population who feed our country are not crying "wolf" when we warn that, without concerted efforts, the structure of American agriculture will be irretrievably altered.

Clearly, the entire Congress—not just a few rural legislators—must be concerned about the prospect that the amber waves will no longer be tended by our network of family farmers, for the demise of the family farm will also threaten those businesses which depend upon a large rural constituency as well as create new problems for our cities as former farmers seek employment elsewhere.

As producers become insolvent and leave their farms, the small businesses that depend on their patronage will soon close their doors. Schools, churches, and hospitals whose day-to-day existence depends on volume of people served cannot survive when their population base is eroding rapidly. Banks will recover only a small percentage of outstanding loans under these depressed conditions and will not remain open for long. In short, we are facing the fundamental destruction of rural society.

Even if, for some reason, that destruction does not concern our urban brethren, we must all remember that, while only a few of us represent producers, we all represent consumers. For years, American consumers have benefited, rightly or wrongly, from a cheap food policy. That policy will not long endure with the agricultural productive capacity of our country in the hands of a relatively small number of large corporate farms who can demand—and receive—whatever compensation they choose for their efforts. The result will be an unprecedented consumer revolt as food prices soar.

As such, the future of American agriculture is justifiably the concern of every Member of the House of Representatives. Thus, we must take every opportunity to craft legislation that will reverse those economic conditions forcing producers off their land.

FEDERAL LEGISLATION

Of course, the landmark agricultural legislation we will consider this year will be the 1985 farm bill. Yet, we will need much more than a good farm bill to revive the agricultural sector of our economy.

Even before we report the farm bill from committee, we must produce interim credit legislation to meet the immediate needs of the hundreds of good producers who, without some type of extraordinary help, will not get a crop into the ground this spring.

Further, we must be aware of the fact that virtually every bill we pass in Congress has an impact on the farm sector of the economy.

Since interest payments constitute the largest portion of any farmer's current expenses while depressed commodity prices are often related to declining exports, Clayton Yuetter, president of the Chicago Merchantile Exchange, and others have suggested that what we do in the areas of fiscal, monetary, and trade policy will impact more greatly on farmers than the farm bill, itself.

Accordingly, as we consider the budget and the appropriations bills that follow, we must be ever-mindful of the need for deficit reduction so as to relieve pressure on interest rates and decrease the strength of the U.S. dollar. Both actions would enhance net farm income in the long run.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE 1985 FARM BILL

At the same time, the importance of the 1985 farm bill should not be underemphasized for it is the single greatest combination of Federal farm programs that comes before Congress at any one time and the quickest way to affect prices in the short run. While we will begin working on this legislation in the Agriculture Committee in the upcoming week, it probably will not emerge from committee until late spring or early summer.

During that time, I intend to publish a series of articles in this section of the RECORD calling the attention of my colleagues to the various issues surrounding the drafting of the farm bill in hopes of providing continuing information on these important topics.

Virtually everyone from the Secretary of Agriculture on down have so often repeated that American agriculture is at a crossroads that the expression is becoming trite. Regardless, the facts are that agriculture faces a bigger challenge today than at any time in the past 50 years. And, quite frankly, how we respond to that challenge will determine the structure of the American farm economy not only until the end of the decade, but well into the 21st century.

We can ill-afford to bury our heads in the sand and make mere cosmetic changes in old laws. We need to respond creatively to this challenge with new thoughts and ideas, not mere repetition of what has come before.

At the outset, we must consider going to a longer farm bill—perhaps as much as 6 years—that will permit us to address both the short-term needs of our individual producers and the long-term market goals of the industry as a whole. In this way, we not only preserve the American dream of our farmers in the present, but protect it from the future as well.

Additionally, an authorization for 6 years would move consideration of the next farm bill into the middle of the first term of the next administration—where it belongs in the first place. This has the dual benefit of providing producers with 6 years of future information for planning purposes and allows the next President time to get his team in place before taking on a major reauthorization of farm programs. Accordingly, serious attention should be given to a 6-year farm bill.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would simply say that I look forward to working with all of my colleagues in the 99th Congress on solutions to the grave problems facing our farm communities. Our work will be long and difficult, but our reward will be a sound agricultural economy that will continue to feed not only our Nation, but the hungry of the world. We should work to achieve nothing less.●

GILLIS LONG REMEMBERED

HON. LINDY (MRS. HALE) BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, recently this House paused from its legislative schedule so that a number of its Members could honor and remember our late friend and colleague, Gillis Long. I would like to share the editorial and commentary that appeared in the New Orleans Times-Picayune-States-Item the week of Gillis' death.

The editorial and commentary follow:

[From the New Orleans Times-Picayune/States-Item Editorial, Jan. 23, 1985]

GILLIS W. LONG

Gillis W. Long, who died Sunday at the age of 61, will be remembered by his colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives for his efforts to define new policies for his faltering Democratic Party. But those who knew him best in Louisiana will remember him mainly for the consistency of his political convictions throughout his public career.

Many would call Mr. Long, who represented Louisiana's 8th Congressional District for 12 years and ran unsuccessfully for governor twice, a liberal. He was impatient with the term, preferring to be known simply as someone with compassion for the less fortunate of our society.

Yet the term "liberal" was not inappropriate. Many of the positions in which he served, as well as his voting record in Congress, reflected his devotion to such classical liberal concerns as the welfare of the poor and minorities. He earned high marks from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and Americans for Democratic Action, a liberal monitoring group.

Yet Mr. Long, whose varied district reached all the way from Alexandria in central Louisiana to St. John the Baptist Parish in the south, had his conservative side as well. He was a financial lawyer specializing in investment banking between his congressional stints, and he voted conservatively on such economic issues as oil policy and water projects that were of special interest in Louisiana.

There is no doubt, however, of the direction of Mr. Long's basic political instincts. He was a champion of civil rights in the 1960s, a time when it took courage for a white Southern politician to support publicly the issues of most concern to blacks. Mindful of Mr. Long's commitment, President Lyndon Johnson named him the first assistant director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, the federal anti-poverty agency, in 1965. Mr. Long had lost his congressional seat the year before to his cousin Speedy Long, who argued that Gillis Long was too liberal on civil rights issues.

Faithful to his convictions, Rep. Long was the only member of Louisiana's 10-member congressional delegation to back Walter Mondale for the Democratic presidential nomination before last year's Democratic convention.

Among his colleagues, conservatives as well as liberals, Rep. Long was respected for his hard work and leadership abilities. He was a key figure on several important House committees, including the Rules Committee. He was also a driving force in the House Democratic caucus, a group dedicated to producing new policies for the Democratic Party.

Gillis Long stuck by his convictions and earned the respect of political friend and foe alike, and it was a fitting tribute that President Reagan, before beginning his inaugural address Monday, called the nation's attention to his passing and asked for a moment of silence in his honor.

THE LITTLE MAN: A CHAMPION OF THE LITTLE FELLOW

[From the New Orleans Times-Picayune/States Item, Jan. 23, 1985]

(By Jack Wardlaw)

("In the old Long tradition, Gillis Long was always the little man's public official."—Gov. Edwin W. Edwards.)

Edwin Edwards has it right; Gillis Long was the quintessential modern Louisiana populist, the friend of the little guy.

Long died this week at the age of 61, the victim of a heart that wouldn't stand up to the massive workload he imposed upon himself. If it can be truly said of anyone that he worked himself to death, here is the example.

The last time I saw Gillis, he turned up a couple of months ago at a luncheon of the Baton Rouge Press Club, which happens to meet in his district. He wasn't the speaker, he just showed up to say hello. He looked terrible.

I'd known Gillis since the early 1960s, and when I asked how he was feeling it wasn't a pleasantry, and he knew it. But he brushed the inquiry aside and launched into a lengthy litany of what he was up to in Washington—the Rules Committee was doing this, the Louisiana delegation was doing that, the Joint Economic Committee was doing the other. The Democratic Party was about to undertake something or other, and Common Cause was pushing a reform bill with his name on it. Whatever it was, Gillis Long was in the thick of it.

Gillis Long, only a distant cousin of Huey, Earl and Russell Long, came on the political scene in 1962, getting elected to Congress from the old 8th District, when it was located in North Louisiana. That district has since migrated south along with the population, and is now dominated by the River Parishes and reaches into the New Orleans area to include St. John the Baptist.

Soon—perhaps too soon—he became a statewide political figure and plunged into the 1963 governor's race. At that time, he was a "new face" up against such old ones as Chep Morrison, Bob Kennon and Shelby Jackson. But there was another "new face" in the race, that of one John J. McKeithen.

Gillis couldn't unite the Long faction behind him and McKeithen (the other Long faction candidate) edged him out of second place and went on to upset Morrison in the runoff.

Factional disputes run deep in Louisiana, and Gillis had earned the enmity of the McKeithen people. Thus in 1964, with McKeithen in the Mansion, Gillis was challenged for his congressional seat by another distant cousin, Speedy O. Long on Jena. Speedy won, and Long was out of public office for eight years.

But he remained active politically, and in 1971 was ready for his big push for the governorship. McKeithen was retiring and Gillis, though no longer a "new face," figured he could take the measure of the front runners, former Gov. Jimmie H. Davis and longtime Lt. Gov. C.C. "Taddy" Aycock.

That he might have done, but as it turned out, the race was dominated by two newcomers—a young congressman named Edwin Edwards, and a state senator from Shreveport named J. Bennett Johnston.

Johnston came out of nowhere to edge Gillis out of second place, and came within an eyelash of whipping Edwards in the runoff. Edwards then polished off one David C. Treen in the general election.

This time, however, Gillis wasn't out in the cold. He had taken the precaution of endorsing Edwards against Johnston in the runoff, and when it came time to remap the state's congressional districts, a grateful Edwards saw to it that the 8th District was structured to Gillis' liking. He returned to Congress in 1974.

Packing Gillis off to Congress kept him out of Edwards' hair, but it was like throwing Br'er Rabbit into the briarpatch. He became a leader among Democratic congressmen and, had his health held up, he might someday have been House speaker. Or he might have returned to Louisiana as governor.

But he was felled by a heart attack in 1979 and passed up that year's governor's race, in which he arguably might have beaten Treen. He recovered and went back to a frantic pace in Congress.

He compiled an unusual voting record for a Louisiana congressman, championing the cause of minorities, women and the "little man." Even his critics will agree that he chalked up a distinguished career.

Now it's over, but he won't be soon forgotten. The heart that failed him in the end was big enough to assure that.

REMEMBERING THE LATE GILLIS LONG, WITH FONDNESS

(By Iris Kelso)

Gillis Long, more than any politician I ever knew, was motivated by a sense of responsibility. That and a driving intellect.

Intellect, not ego, although he was not short of ego. He wanted to look after people, to see that things ran right.

I first noticed this in 1963, when Long was running for governor. He, his wife Cathy and some staff members had been campaigning through the state, flying from city to city in a private plane. I was with them.

When we landed at the New Orleans Lakefront Airport, several of us were going to different places. Most politicians, when they get off an airplane, start looking for photographers. Or they march off looking very important, their wives and staff members flapping along behind them.

Not Gillis Long. He headed straight for the luggage, which had been placed on the runway. He stood there over the luggage cart, separating the bags, checking with each of us to see that our bags were there and not headed for the wrong destination.

Long was like this whether he was dealing with national legislation, the national Democratic Party, the Louisiana Democratic Party, a political campaign or a luncheon with friends. He wanted everybody to reach their destination, and he accepted responsibility for the system for getting them there.

He treasured his friends and kept up with friends all over the country.

Kathy Vick, Louisiana's national Democratic committeewoman, recalls that she once asked Long if he would help her in her campaign to get elected head of the National Association of Democratic State Chairs, an organization of state Democratic leaders. She got involved in her campaign and forgot all about asking Long for help. She picked up the telephone one day and it was Long, asking, "How you coming, Kathy?" He was there to help.

Bob D'Hemecourt, Gov. Edwin W. Edwards' executive assistant in New Orleans, says Long often called him just to see how he and his family were doing. "He didn't want me to do anything. He just wanted to see how we were," says D'Hemecourt.

John Mmahat, a New Orleans businessman, was one of Long's closest friends in New Orleans. Long was best man in his wedding.

"I always knew that I could call Gillis any time of the night or day if I needed anything. He would do it if it was legal and right," Mmahat says.

D'Hemecourt says Long knew after his heart surgery in 1981 that he was living on borrowed time. "He had only 35 percent of his heart capacity working," says D'Hemecourt.

Yet Long continued his work in Congress as if he were fully recovered. It was typical of him—pragmatic, efficient, concerned about details—that he would have been making plans for his funeral two weeks before his death. He specified that he wanted women and blacks included among his pallbearers.

Long was a true populist, in that he cared deeply about the fate of ordinary people, especially the poor.

He had been poor himself. His father owned a restaurant in the little town of Tannehill, near Winnfield, La., and lost everything in the Depression. Long often said that he would never have been able to go to college if he had not had the GI bill after his service in World War II.

Long met Cathy while attending Louisiana State University and they were married shortly afterward. The two had a 38-year romance and partnership.

They were best friends, in a way that other political couples envied. Most politicians are quick to say that their wives are "supportive." But Gillis Long was "supportive" of Cathy, too.

Some years ago, she decided to go to work as a "Kelly girl," filling temporary jobs in Washington. Many congressmen would have been embarrassed to have their wives working in such jobs. But Long backed Cathy in her decision, knowing that she needed an interest of her own.

More than any other Louisiana politician, Long was interested in the state's Democratic Party. He was a close friend of Jesse Bankston, the party's longtime chairman, and the two worked together to try to develop a real party organization.

Although he ran twice for governor, Long never realized his dream of being governor. I think it was because he didn't look right to the anti-Long forces and he didn't sound right to the Long people.

In sum, Gillis Long was one of the best human beings I ever met, that rare breed, a man of unselfish motivations.●

HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES BY NICARAGUAN "CONTRAS"

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, the decision to fund or not fund the efforts of the anti-Sandinista "Contra" rebels will soon be once again before this House. I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues an incident which took place on January 8, 1985, involving the kidnapping by the Contras of an American Maryknoll Sister. Sister Nancy Donovan was released by her captors unharmed. But 14 civilians were killed near the town of Limay where she worked, on that same day. According to Sister Donovan, almost 40 civilians were killed in 1 month from the town of Limay alone. She reports that the Contra attacks have been made on civilian, and not military targets.

It is becoming increasingly difficult for this administration to put a good face on the Contra war. Covert action against Nicaragua has come to mean the destruction of economic infrastructure, the publication of manuals urging the assassination of Sandinista officials, the terrorizing of civilians and the kidnapping of American citizens. On January 4 of this year the Contras described their goal on the clandestine Radio 15th of September: "to defeat the Sandinistas militarily."

I urge you to read Sister Donovan's statement, and consider carefully the evidence she presents during our deliberations over funding for the covert war later in this session.

PRESS STATEMENT OF SISTER NANCY DONOVAN

My name is Sister Nancy Donovan from Waterbury, Connecticut and I have been a Maryknoll Sister for thirty-five years. I have served as a missionary in Central America for twenty-nine years and my most recent mission assignment is to the parish of San Juan de Limay, in the Diocese of Esteli, in Nicaragua where I have been a pastoral worker for three years. I wish to relate to you to the details of the events that occurred on Tuesday, January 8, 1985 in that same town.

At approximately 6 a.m. I left the town of Limay to go to Esteli in order to attend the Clergy meeting of the Diocese of Esteli which had been called by my Bishop Ruben Lopez Ardon. I had to search for a ride in a private vehicle since the town's only bus had been burnt by counterrevolutionary forces on December 9th and now there is no public transportation. I found a ride with a refugee family which had been displaced by a counterrevolutionary attack on a village on the outskirts of Limay on December 27th. This family was transporting their few belongings to Esteli. An 18 year old boy also had asked to be taken in the same pick-up truck. All were civilians and unarmed.

About six kilometers outside of Limay, just before the turn-off onto the new road to Esteli, we spotted a tractor parked in the middle of the road. Five armed men in blue counter-revolutionary uniforms with FDN marked on their uniforms came from behind the tractor and stopped our truck. They made us leave the vehicle and we joined about twenty-five civilians who were being held in a gully by the side of the road. After about ten minutes they told us we could continue on our way. I do not know what eventually happened to the other civilians who were being held by the side of the road.

We continued on down the new road to Esteli. I began to be fearful for the safety of those being held on the road, and others who would leave Limay and would be stopped by the counter-revolutionary forces. I also feared for the safety of the passengers in our car since I believed there were probably more forces on the road ahead. I felt the most important thing I could do to prevent danger to travelers was to try to return to Limay as quickly as possible to inform departing vehicles about the danger on the road. After traveling another four kilometers we came to a small village called El Pedernal. I asked the driver to leave me there and he continued in the direction of Esteli. I went to four houses to search for a horse to ride back but there was none. So I set out walking on a small back road which I knew from my pastoral visits to the zone would lead me to Platanares and then to Limay. I walked about two kilometers and passed the houses of Pozo Colorado. Shortly after that I was stopped on the path by two armed men in FDN uniforms. They asked me where I was going and I told them to Limay. They spoke on walkie-talkies for some moments and then told me I could go no further and must stay in their custody. They directed me to a stone wall where there were more armed, uniformed men, about twenty in all. I estimate that this was about 7 or 7:30 a.m.—I had no watch. I was held there for approximately three hours. During that time three or four peasants and a woman and child also were stopped on the path and held with me. At about 8 a.m. I heard some gunfire from the old road where we had initially been stopped. There was a long wait of over an hour. Then I heard very loud automatic machine-gun fire and heavy artillery coming from Loma Atravesada which is further along the road to Esteli. I prayed for the lives of those who were involved.

A few minutes later, after talking on walkie-talkies, the counter-revolutionary forces lined us up between their own forces in single file and had us begin to walk. After a short distance the counter-revolutionary forces separated me from the rest of the civilians and sent me with three armed men to wait at the top of the hill ahead. The other civilians never appeared again. They were left behind and I do not know what happened to them. The rest of the twenty armed men joined me and the three men guarding me and we continued the march for about one kilometer where we joined up with about twenty armed uniformed men of the FDN. We moved on for another one to two kilometers to Santa Ana. I told the counterrevolutionary forces I would leave them and cut back to Limay but they would not let me go. We then walked another kilometer on the path and then began marching over rough terrain, through rivers and hills for about four kilometers until we joined about twenty more armed, uniformed men making the total about sixty. We were there about an hour or so. During that time some of the men were boasting about the success they had had in the ambushes on the road.

I then again attempted to leave. They prevented me from doing so until the arrival of four of their FDN leaders who joined them. These four men began to interrogate me about my work and identity. They searched my belongings and began to read my address book. After some time of discussion among themselves and on the walkie-talkie they told me that I could go. I estimate that this was about 3:30 p.m.

I walked to the village of Santa Ana where a family gave me food and coffee since I had not eaten all day. A farmer took me on his horse as far as La Grecia which is about three to four kilometers from Limay. I walked the rest of the way to the town and it was close to 6 p.m. when I arrived there. I estimate that I walked about sixteen to eighteen kilometers that day.

Regarding my time with the counterrevolutionary forces I was never physically mistreated by any of them. I received the most abrupt treatment from the FDN leaders. I observed that the sixty men were well armed and equipped. One of the men wore an arm patch which said "Soldier of Fortune, Second Convention". Another had "U.S. army" written on the front of his uniform. They showed me their new knapsacks and told me they had received new equipment recently. They told me that their supplies are dropped by planes which "fly very quietly at night". They hoped that they would be receiving new supplies that night to replenish the ammunition they had used that day.

When I arrived in Limay I was greeted by a North American woman who is a member of Witness for Peace, who has been present with me in Limay for a few weeks. I quickly found out that fourteen civilians had been killed by the FDN forces in different ambushes along the roads to Limay that same day. Nine were construction workers ambushed in Loma Atravesada, two workers from the Ministry of Natural Resources, two young coffee pickers and a tractor driver were killed along the road to Pueblo Nuevo. I saw four tractors which were destroyed. At least ten persons were kidnapped, but there may be more. I also found out that the original vehicle in which I had been traveling had been stopped again by the FDN forces after I had left it to walk to Limay. The eighteen year old youth, Freddy Castellon, had been kidnapped.

We spent that night and the next day washing the bodies of the dead, comforting families and praying with them, and burying the dead from Limay. The bodies of the eleven people who were from other places were transported the next day to Esteli. It was very difficult to communicate all that had happened because the telephone and telegraph lines were destroyed by the counter-revolutionaries about one month ago.

Yesterday, January 10th, I traveled from Limay to Esteli in our jeep accompanied by the Witness for Peace member and a small child who was ill. I went immediately to inform Bishop Lopez of all that happened and then I came to Managua late last night.

To conclude I want to say that I feel grateful to God for my own safety but that I am much more concerned for those who were killed on the same day in Limay and for the thousands of innocent people who have been killed over the past four years as a result of the counterrevolutionary attacks. Just in Limay, almost forty civilians have been killed in the past month. The attacks have been made on civilian, not military, targets and they are increasing. As a Christian and as a U.S. citizen I am deeply pained by the fact that my government has been responsible for arming and training these forces which have caused the deaths of so many. I continue to join my voice and my prayer to that of the U.S. Catholic Bishops, and of the churches and faithful across the U.S. who have protested the U.S. government's covert war against Nicaragua, and who are calling for a peaceful solution to the conflict. I express my deep gratitude for the messages of love and concern I have received. I will return to my pastoral work in Limay this week.

QUESTIONS

Question. When you described these people as civilians, do we assume that they were unarmed, that there was no combat? When you say civilians, what do you mean?

Answer. I meant that they were not members of the armed forces, as far as I know. I was not there at the time of the attack. I do not know what really happened, but they were not members of the armed forces, they were road workers, coffee pickers, tractor drivers, workers of the Natural Resources Institute.

Question. Sister, why do you think you were released? Sometimes captives are not released. Why do you think that you were released?

Answer. I think that I was released because I was not much help to them, and I could have caused them problems. I was not much help because captives are kept to carry burdens or to cook. I'm not much good for either of these.

Question. Did they know that you were a Catholic sister?

Answer. Yes, some of the people recognized me.

Question. The way you described it you implied that the reason that they held you for a time was so that you would not be able to inform the people that there was an ambush in the area. Is that a correct interpretation?

Answer. That's the way that I felt the situation. Yes.

Question. What were the words that they used when they were boasting about the ambush? Do you remember what they said?

Answer. They came back and told the group—because apparently of the group of 60, only about 20 of them, I understood, had been in the ambush of Loma Atravesada—and they came back and said that there were so many vehicles and so many dead, and they just seemed to be in such a happy mood about the situation.

Question. Were all the counterrevolutionaries Nicas as far as you could see, or were there people of other nationalities?

Answer. The ones that I talked to seemed to be Nicaraguans. I'm not sure whether the others were Nicaraguans or not.

Question. Don't you fear after those clear words that you have said about the counter revolution in this press conference that next time they get you they will kill you?

Answer. I don't know. I think that their orientation changes from time to time. Right now their orientation seems to be to terrorize and to kill civilians. I hope not, and I know that every mother who sees her sons going out in the morning and everyone who has to travel this road has the same fear. Fear is present. We may be killed at any time. I may be killed, the boy down the street may be killed, a woman with a child may be kidnapped to cook for them. So this is part of it.

Question. What do you mean by abrupt? (Referring to the questioning by the counter-revolutionary leaders.)

Answer. He seemed very much in charge of the situation, demanding my papers, demanding to search my things without any type of discussion going on there. He definitely was in command of the situation. At one time, he grabbed my bag and started going through it.

Question. What did you say to the Contras when you asked to leave? What did you say to convince them to let you go?

Answer. When I was first stopped, they told me that they would let me go as soon as the action was over. And they kept promising to let me go, but then the chain of command seemed to get higher and higher. They would always have to check with someone further up and then someone further up would say: "No, not yet, bring her." So I kept being brought further. When we got to Santa Ana, I said that this was the place to let me go so that I wouldn't have to walk further and then go back because I was beginning to wonder if they meant it or not. "No," they said, "keep on walking." So when we finally got to Los Encuentros, I said, "I'd like to talk to your highest in command." And I reminded him that this could cause more repercussions if he didn't let me go. I think that by this time, he was aware of who I was. I don't think that in the beginning he was aware that I was a North American. He said, "They didn't let me know. They didn't give me good information." However, I think that the important thing is that whoever is kidnapped runs this risk of being let go or not.

Question. How many of the dead did you know? Do you know the names of the FDN leaders?

Answer. Some of the people who were killed and their families, I know very well. They were friends of mine. They were right from Limay. Some of the road workers I probably knew but they were burned so badly that I didn't even look at them, I don't know, I didn't even see those people. I do not know the names of the FDN men. I wasn't interested in finding out.●

MARION WADE DOYLE

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to insert at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the Washington Post's tribute to the late Mrs. Henry Grattan Doyle. A woman of extraordinary depth, Marion Wade Doyle's selfless life was an inspiration to the many whose lives she influenced. In her biography in "Who's Who in America," the final statement reflects Mrs. Doyle's 90 years of life: "Let no day pass without doing something for somebody else."

Marion Wade Doyle received her Phi Beta Kappa key on the occasion of the 60th anniversary of her graduation from Radcliffe College when she led the commencement procession at Harvard University in 1984. Mrs. Doyle graced my 84th birthday celebration as an honored octogenarian on October 4, 1984.

It is my honor to share with my distinguished colleagues and all who read this RECORD Mrs. Doyle's profound achievements and her unwavering faith of a lifetime by inserting the following account of her dedicated life, as well as the Washington Post's editorial, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 9, 1985]

ACTIVIST MARION W. DOYLE DIES AT 90

(By J.Y. Smith)

Marion Wade Doyle, 90, a member of the D.C. school board from 1928 until she resigned in 1949, and its president from 1935 until the end of her service, died of a heart ailment Jan. 8 at her home in Washington.

Mrs. Doyle's service on the school board was the longest and most visible facet of a career in civic and public works that included a term as executive vice president of the national League of Women Voters and the chairmanship of the D.C. commission for the 1960 White House Conference on Children and Youth. As a young woman, she marched in behalf of women's suffrage.

When she announed that she was leaving the school board, The Washington Post said in an editorial that she had "worked tirelessly to improve not merely the schools in this city, but also the full area of educational activity. . . . No single person knows Washington better than she, and none has done more valiant work to build a better city."

Mrs. Doyle, a teacher by training, was fond of noting that in 1805, Thomas Jefferson became the first president of the first board of trustees of the Washington school system and that he took the post out of a commitment to education. In her day, members of the board were appointed by the judges of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. The board members elected one of their own number to be president. Mrs. Doyle was the first woman to hold the post.

During her years on the board, Mrs. Doyle was guided by her conviction that teachers are more important than buildings and that teachers and school buildings exist to serve students.

To this end, she worked to improve teacher salaries and benefits and to persuade Congress, which then had sole responsibility for the D.C. budget, to provide money for classrooms to house a steadily growing school population. When she was appointed to the board in 1928, the system had 73,157 students, of whom 48,585 were white and 24,772 were black. When she resigned, there were 91,219 students, of whom 47,955 were white and 43,264 were black.

Although the schools here were segregated by law, Mrs. Doyle was known as an opponent of segregation and as an advocate of improved opportunities for blacks.

On matters of curriculum, she took the Jeffersonian view that a well-informed citizenry is the best guarantee of democracy. Thus, in 1935, she opposed a "red rider" clause in the school appropriations bill that required teachers to sign a statement each payday declaring that they had not taught or advocated communism.

"No American is in favor of 'advocating' communism, but to 'teach' it in the sense of explaining to students what communism is should be a part of any educational program," she wrote in an article for the Radcliffe Quarterly that was excerpted in The Post. "Fear ruled the teachers in the history classes and, of course, many of them skipped over any mention of communism. In effect, the Congress of the United States was writing a history course for the pupils of Washington."

In 1937, Congress repealed the clause.

Mrs. Doyle was born in Cambridge, Mass. She graduated from Radcliffe College and then taught in the Cambridge schools. In an interview with The Post in 1968, when she had returned to Radcliffe for a reunion, she recalled marching in a suffrage parade in Boston. That was in 1915, and to take part in the parade she passed up a chance to attend a Harvard-Brown football game with a young Harvard instructor named Henry Grattan Doyle.

"Principle prevailed," she said. "But I am a woman of determination and, in those days, fleet of foot, and I chased that young man until I caught him, and he was my husband for 47 years."

The Doyles moved to Washington in 1917. Dr. Doyle taught at George Washington University and became dean of its Columbian College. He died in 1964.

Mrs. Doyle became active in the League of Women Voters and was president of the Washington chapter in the late 1920s. She also held national office in the organization. During World War II, she was president of the D.C. Commissioners' War Hospitality Committee. In the 1950s, she chaired the Advisory Commission to the D.C. Juvenile Court.

Her numerous honors included the National Brotherhood Award of the National Conference of Christians and Jews in 1956. Radcliffe designated her a distinguished alumna and in 1984, on the 60th anniversary of her own graduation, she led the commencement procession at Harvard University.

Survivors include a son, Robert Carr Doyle of Chevy Chase; a daughter, Marion Wade Campbell of Richmond; eight grandchildren, and three great-grandchildren.

MARION WADE DOYLE

Though it may strike some of today's readers as extraordinarily lavish praise, The Post's editorial in 1949—when Marion Wade Doyle resigned after more than 20 years of remarkable service on the D.C. School Board—was meant to be just that. "No single person knows Washington better than she," it said, "and none has done more valiant work to build a better city." Mrs. Doyle, who died here Tuesday at the age of 90, knew firsthand the many worlds of Washington—from the well-heeled white establishment to the strictly segregated blacks of the city and the other urban underclasses that depended on understanding and generosity to survive. And out of this deep love of people in general and young people in particular came a tireless devotion to the betterment of public education and the importance of brotherhood.

Mrs. Doyle's service on the school board—including 15 years as its president—may have been the most visible and lasting of her many contributions to life in this city. But her commitment to civil liberties and rights came earlier, in her home town of Cambridge, Mass. It was there, this Radcliffe College graduate would recall in an interview, that she marched in a suffrage parade, passing up a chance to attend the 1915 Harvard-Brown football game with a young Harvard instructor named Henry Grattan Doyle. "Principle prevaled," she said, "but I am a woman of determination. . . . I chased that young man until I caught him, and he was my husband for 47 years."

In Washington, where the Doyles moved in 1917, she became active in the League of Women Voters, eventually serving as president of the local chapter and a national officer. On the school board, Mrs. Doyle fought for better teacher salaries and stood up annually before Congress to argue for more school money in the D.C. budget for classrooms and supplies needed desperately by a growing school population. And she made no bones about her strong opposition to the racial segregation that divided the schools then and well afterward, until the Brown decision.

Another courageous battle was Mrs. Doyle's vigorous opposition in 1935 to a "Red rider" clause in the school appropriations bill that required teachers to sign a statement each payday declaring that they had not taught or advocated communism. It was repealed two years later.

To those who know a different Washington today, maybe much of this seems as routine as it is right. But for a woman to speak out as she did when she did took exceptional courage and a true sense of justice. And that which is different and better about Washington today is living tribute to Marion Doyle's presence among us.●

THE BELLS OF BASTOGNE

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, this past holiday season I was inspired by an article I read concerning the actions taken by Mr. Alden Todd of Leonia, NJ in the name of peace and brotherhood. Forty years ago Mr. Todd, than a rifleman with the 101st Airborne Division, fought gallantly beside his comrades to defend the Belgian town of Bastogne from a brutal German assault. The Battle of the Bulge, as we know it today, lives on in our memories as one of the bloodiest battles of the Second World War, but for Mr. Todd, its legacy is one of hope rather than despair.

Mr. Todd recently returned to Bastogne and found a town grateful for its freedom but mindful of its cost. I have chosen to share the story of Mr. Todd's journey so that we may learn from his insights and appreciate the magnitude of sacrifice shown on that fateful day 40 years ago.

THE BELLS OF BASTOGNE

(By Alden Todd)

Since Christmas Eve, the bells of Saint-Pierre, the central church of Bastogne in the Belgian Ardennes, have rung out with a new sound—one of gratitude for deliverance and the hope for peace. To the ringing of the three bells that have long hung in this 12th century church have been added the sound of three new bells that commemorate the 40th anniversary of Bastogne's deepest agony and of her rescue.

During World War II, the name Bastogne became well-known to Americans. When the Germans launched their final, desperate offensive against the Allied forces on Dec. 16, 1944, they swept through southern Belgium and northern Luxembourg. By the time they were finally halted and driven back to the German frontier, the Battle of the Bulge had taken its place in history. Within that battle, the defense of Bastogne deserves a special place.

The Germans encircled Bastogne, where the 101st Airborne Division, along with several other scattered military units, held out for nearly a week against heavy odds until the first armored units broke through the siege lines on Dec. 26. When the German commander told the Americans to surrender, Gen. Anthony McAuliffe gave his classic defiant reply, "Nuts!"

Those of us who were under McAuliffe's command at the time revere his memory. We knew we could depend on him, and he knew he could count on us. The ammunition and food were short, but the morale was high.

What is often overlooked when stories of battles are told is the agony of the civilian population. The shelling and bombings brought devastation and death to Bastogne and its neighboring villages. Where the Germans took possession, the SS slaughtered men and boys in senseless, brutal reprisal.

As the 40th anniversary of the Battle of Bastogne approached, there were discussion in the town about the 1984 commemoration. Active among those planning the events was the senior priest of Bastogne, the Abbe Georges Galand, pastor of Saint-Pierre.

In mid-December, when I visited him in his study, he told me of the role that his church would play. Three bells would be added to its belfry, one of them dedicated to the Americans of 1944-45.

Installed shortly before Christmas, the American bell is inscribed to the "76,890 Americans killed, wounded, or missing in the Battle of the Bulge. May their sacrifice contribute to lasting peace. Noel 1984."

The second new bell was given by the association of Belgian veterans, inscribed with the message of hope for a world without war. The third was contributed by a group of Germans who wanted to add their voice to the call for peace.

For Americans, the bells have a particular significance. The six together sound the notes: do, re, mi, sol, la, and do of the major scale. On the half-hour, the bells sound the first six notes of our national anthem. On the hour, they play the first 22 notes of the largo movement of Dvorak's symphony "From the New World."

Although he was at first reluctant to discuss the matter, I found from the Abbe Galand that the new American bell cost 450,000 Belgian francs—about $7,300. This is a large sum for the Bastognois to raise but a fairly modest amount for Americans.

Those in the United States who feel touched by this gesture of gratitude to us by the people of Bastogne may wish to show their support to the Abbe Galand and his associates. Charles Boggess of Austin, TX, commander of the lead tank that broke through the ring around Bastogne in 1944 and who returned for the 40th anniversary, has already pledged his support. Who will follow?

(Alden Todd of Leonia was a rifleman and interpreter during the Battle of Bastogne.)●

TEACHER WARRANTY ACT OF 1985

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce the Teacher Warranty Act of 1985.

The word is out—in the next few years we are going to have a teacher shortage in this country. The pendulum has swung back and the glut of the past few years has disappeared. We have crossed the demographic divide: There are more students entering the classrooms while fewer people are choosing to enter the teaching profession.

The National Center for Education Statistics has found that by the fall of this year there will be a shortage of 11,000 teachers in the profession. By 1992, we will be 72,000 people short of the needed number of teachers to instruct our children.

The reasons for this shortage are fairly obvious. More and more young people are attracted to business, medicine, and the law—for the money and prestige that those professions offer. The close scrutiny and criticism that the teaching profession has received lately, combined with low teacher salaries, will cause a teacher shortage.

In the 98th Congress, I introduced the Talented Teacher Act to take the first step to reverse this trend. The Talented Teacher Fellowships and the Carl D. Perkins Scholarship Program were authorized by the Congress and signed into law by the President. Once the appropriations are secured, these programs will attract more young people to the profession and provide incentives for excellent teachers to stay in the classroom.

But, what do we do to help the new teacher in the first year in the classroom? How do we assure that person that it isn't "sink or swim" in the first year of teaching?

I recently visited Oregon State University School of Education and learned more about an excellent new program that has been implemented to provide support for the new teacher. This program has been established at several other teacher-training colleges around the country, as well.

The idea is basic:

Education schools are held accountable for the in-classroom teaching abilities of their graduates during their first 2 years of teaching.

If new teachers are evaluated by a school system and found deficient in a particular area, they may return to the education school for "re-tooling" at no cost.

A professor of education at Purdue University said of their new warranty program, "There is no way we could afford this kind of guarantee if we didn't have confidence in the quality of our graduates." This plan holds the university responsible for the quality of their graduates.

That is the key to the success of the program. The schools that have instituted this warranty are confident that they are providing a high-quality teacher-training program and that few of their graduates will need further help. But, the help is there for those teachers who may need a little extra attention.

This is not a gimmick—the schools do not stamp "satisfaction guaranteed" on the foreheads of their graduates, nor do they send out a Maytag repairman if there are problems. The schools are backing up their graduates with the knowledge that help is available, and they are instilling that essential ingredient—confidence—in the new teacher.

Teacher warranty programs are just getting off the ground in several schools across the country. In a recent conversation with Robert Barr, dean of education at Oregon State University, I learned that in the 6 months that their teacher warranty program has been in existence, they have had only one student return for help.

This is testimony to the excellent teacher training program at that school and it is something that every education school in the country should do for their graduates.

Therefore, I am introducing the Teacher Warranty Act of 1985. It does the following:

It amends the Higher Education Act to require that schools of education that receive Federal funds will have to provide a 2-year warranty on the classroom performance of graduates who have received Federal financial aid.

It says, quite simply, that such graduates who receive an unsatisfactory evaluation during their first 2 years of teaching may return to that school of education for retraining to eliminate that deficiency.

This retraining will be provided at no cost to the graduate as long as it does not exceed the amount of Federal assistance received by the student while at the education school. Dean Barr believes that schools of education can easily provide these basic follow up services for graduates within existing budgets.

Retraining or refresher courses may be provided through correspondence programs, summer programs, or courses provided through reciprocal agreements with other institutions of higher education.

This bill does not tie the hands of individual schools. It leaves universities plenty of room to design unique, innovative approaches within their own programs.

The warranty bill establishes a partnership between the education school and the new teacher which is essential if we are to have excellent teachers in the classroom. Eventually, the warranty program can become obsolete—because teachers will be so well prepared that they will not need retraining.

I have spoken with the staffs of the American Federation of Teachers and the National Education Association and they feel that this idea is a strong step in the right direction. I ask that you join them in their quest for improvements in teacher education and support this innovative legislation.

The legislation follows:

H.R. 937

A bill to amend the Higher Education Act of 1965 to require that schools of education provide warranties for the teachers such schools train with Federal student assistance

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Teacher Warranty Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 487(a) of the Higher Education Act of 1975 (20 U.S.C. 1094), relating to the program participation agreements required for student assistance programs, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(7) In the case of a school of education (as that term is defined in section 533(d) of this Act), the institution will, for any graduate thereof who receives an unsatisfactory evaluation after the first or second year as a teacher, provide such training or retraining as the graduate requires to eliminate the deficiency. The graduate shall only be charged that part of the cost of such training or retraining as exceeds the amount of the assistance received by the graduate under this title while in attendance at such institution. Such training or retraining may be provided through correspondence programs, summer programs, or programs provided through reciprocal agreements with other institutions of higher education.".

SEC. 3. The amendment made by section 2 of this Act shall only apply with respect to assistance made available under title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965 after the date of enactment of this Act.●

MOTHERS WERE MUZZLED: WHO WILL SPEAK OUT?

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, on October 20, four Salvadoran women were supposed to receive the first Robert F. Kennedy Human Rights Award here in Washington. Unfortunately, the date passed and no one was able to claim the award, because these women were denied visas. The State Department chose to invoke provisions of the 1952 McCarran-Walter Act, which enables consular officers to deny visas on political and ideological grounds. I am very disturbed by this latest denial of visas; I believe it is an embarassment to our foreign policy and an infringement of the right of American citizens to hear from a broad range of views. This incident points up the need to reform our immigration laws. No one should be denied a visa because of the opinions he or she holds, however abhorrent these may be; that person's expected behavior should be the basis for denying a visa.

Mr. Speaker, the Philadelphia Inquirer printed an excellent editorial on the subject, and I ask that it be reprinted here in the RECORD.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Nov. 27, 1984]

MOTHERS WERE MUZZLED: WHO WILL SPEAK OUT?

Four mothers from El Salvador were denied entry into the United States last week. They were to receive the first Robert F. Kennedy Human Rights Award at Georgetown University. They are members of CO-Madres, a group of 500 mostly poor and unschooled women whose brothers, sons and husbands have disappeared or been shot or dismembered in El Salvador's bloody civil strife.

The State Department said the women were wolves in sheep's clothing—that they had advocated violence, taken part in terrorism, that their group had said some stridently anti-American and anti-Duarte things. They were a run-of-the-mill pressure group, the State Department said, who hid behind human rights rhetoric.

Perhaps, a department emissary hinted to the RFK awards staff, something could be done if the award were broadened to include mothers from other Latin American nations. Perhaps, if a speaking tour were curtailed; perhaps, then the visas might not be such a problem.

On the record, the course, and officially, the State Department said it would never stoop to negotiate a visa or to suggest restrictions on the freedom to speak out or to dissent. And, in the end, one mother who was attending a conference in Argentina and who spent the day being vouched for by an English-speaking Catholic priest obtained a visa from the American Embassy in Argentina.

She was flanked by four empty chairs on the Georgetown University stage. She was, she said, no different from her fellow CO-Madres—a victim, not a subversive: She had been raped repeatedly, like many of the others; she had buried the bodyless head of a brother, like many of the others; she had catalogued horrors and protested and demanded investigations. But her compatriots were denied entry—denied the forum to tell their story.

The public might be "prejudiced," the State Department said; U.S. security might be endangered. Such is the language of the 1952 McCarran Act—Section 212(a)(28)(f)— that stopped the mothers. Such is the shield of the immigration law's "ideological exclusion" provisions.

That U.S. security might be shaken by four mothers is an arguable proposition. But there is no doubt the American people might be "prejudiced" against certain Reagan administration policies in Central America were they to take the mothers' stories to heart.

In fact, a large number—perhaps the majority—of Americans already are disenchanted with the trend of U.S. involvement on the isthmus. And there are even more who are appalled at El Salvador's death squads and Washington's continuing inability—despite the leverage of millions of dollars of military aid—to pressure Salvadoran courts to punish their leaders.

Has support worn so thin that the Reagan administration fears a visit by four mothers will rip it to shreds? Does it fear that four mothers will hoodwink the American people if Big Government does not step in to protect them?

Or, and this is the most alarming, is the administration tinkering with Soviet-style information control, picking and choosing who will address the masses, granting the freedom to speak to those who toe the line, muzzling dissenting voices?

The McCarran Act's "ideological exclusion" provisions stand ready for abuse by the powers that be. They should be thoroughly rewritten. but this administration has not only abused them, it has fine-tuned them.

A case in point is the turnabout on El Salvador's most infamous rightwing leader, Roberto D'Aubuisson. He was turned down for a U.S. visa last year, discrediting his presidential candidacy before the Salvadoran elections. But he was approved for one last summer to be feted by Sen. Jesse Helms (R., N.C.) after the Duarte government was safely in office.

Save for civil liberties groups, there is little outcry.

The government will be emboldened by the silence. If it can cut the shape of speech at the margins, why not go for its heart?

That is the clear and present danger to the health of America's democracy: Not that four mothers would speak, but that Big Brother has gagged them.●

TIME FOR US TO LOOK BEYOND VIETNAM WAR

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, General Crittenberger, a retired U.S. Army major general and himself a veteran, has recently called my attention to an article about Vietnam veterans which appeared in USA Today. I agree with General Crittenberger and the author that, as so many veterans have already done, it is time to put away the fatigues and work toward building America's future. I ask that the article be reprinted in the RECORD, and I commend it to my colleagues.

[From the USA Today, Nov. 14, 1984]

TIME FOR US TO LOOK BEYOND VIETNAM WAR—AN OPPOSING VIEW

(By John Wheeler)

BETHESDA, MD.—We can each take specific steps to speed the national assimilation of the Vietnam War. One step is to lay aside the battle fatigues.

For Americans who were not in the military in the 1960s, that means abandoning the stereotype of the Vietnam veteran as someone who still, in his 30s, wears his boonie hat and old battle dress.

Working as chairman of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund, I have watched the media coverage of activities on the Mall in Washington during Veterans Day and Memorial Day in recent years. The nation is flooded with pictures of men in old fatigues.

But the overwhelming majority of Vietnam veterans are not found in fatigues, even on patriotic holidays. They can be identified by their growing leadership in the nation's public and private life, not by the clothes they wear.

The men who do wear the fatigues should ask themselves, "Am I wearing the old uniform in patriotism and celebration? Or is it that I feel better in the old times and am not fully ready to move on?"

The Vietnam Veterans Memorial is simultaneously a stern and comforting place, which helps us answer these questions. Increasingly, it is helping men shed their fatigues, to be saved for wear at times of reunion and remembrance.

But the most important step is to face up to the truth that the Vietnam War affects every citizen in complex ways.

The powerful movements during the Vietnam era—the war, the war protest, and the hyperacceleration of the civil rights, women's, and environmental movements—were interconnected, and they shape our lives and attitudes.

The greatest effects are on the people who came of age politically and emotionally during that period—60 million of us who make up the Vietnam generation, the bulk of the World War II baby-boomers.

Important effects include division and guilt over choices made about the draft and politics during the war years, and separation of one interest group from another, including a sense of estrangement of white males from the leadership of the women's movement.

Foundations, universities, and leaders in government and churches should make study of the after effects of the war a top agenda item, with focus on the Vietnam generation. If we understand how our past shapes us, we can govern how it shapes us.

Meanwhile, it's time for all Americans to shed the fatigues of Vietnam. It's time for those veterans still in camouflage garb to get on with life. And it's time for non-veterans to reject the perpetuation of this inaccurate stereotype; those who shared the Vietnam experience are in fact already building the America of tomorrow.●

THE ADOLESCENT PREGNANCY AND PARENTHOOD ACT OF 1985

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, today, along with 52 of our colleagues from both sides of the aisle, I am introducing the Adolescent Pregnancy and Parenthood Act of 1985. Identical to H.R. 5534, which I introduced in the 98th Congress, this bill would amend title XX of the Public Health Service Act. The legislation does not create a new authority; it merely seeks to amend the current title XX, the Adolescent Family Life Demonstration Projects, to enact a service program designed to meet the pressing needs of children who bear children. It has been designed specifically to help those teenagers who have chosen to carry their pregnancies to term.

I certainly do not need to alert you to the seriousness of the problems of adolescent pregnancy and parenthood. I would, however, like to share some alarming statistics with you. Consider these facts:

During the last decade, the out-of-wedlock birth rate has risen every year among white teens, and has fallen only slightly among black teens.

In 1980, teens accounted for 16 percent of all U.S. births and 28 percent of all first births; among females aged 15 to 19, 8.3 percent of all whites, approximately 691,200 girls, and 16.1 percent of nonwhites, approximately 335,645 girls, became pregnant.

In 1981, approximately 537,000 teenagers became pregnant and chose to carry their pregnancies to term; 197,000 of these teenage births were to mothers under the age of 18.

In 1982, 190,000 adolescents under the age of 18 gave birth.

Babies born to teenage mothers are much more likely to die in the first year of life than those born to mothers over the age of 20. Maternal mortality and morbidity, and the risk of having a low-birth-weight infant are also considerably greater among teenage mothers.

The adverse consequences of adolescent childbearing are far-reaching and long lasting; not only are the young mothers, fathers, and infants touched, but their families as well. The education and training of both young parents must often be curtailed, resulting in a limitation of opportunities for these teenagers to gain the basic skills necessary to compete in today's society; income is, on average, much lower. A high proportion of teenage parents live below the designated poverty level; many more are near poor and in danger of slipping beyond the so-called safety net.

Finally, the probability is high that a teenage mother will bring up her child alone. Even if young parents do marry, they are far more likely to become divorced, their babies far more likely to spend a large part of their childhood in a single-parent household.

Mr. Speaker, grantees under this legislation would provide pre- and post-natal care; well-child care for the infant; family planning services to prevent a repeat pregnancy; education, job, and other counseling services. The bill recognizes the critical role of the family, and thus stresses the importance of family support and involvement. Finally, in view of the current fiscal realities, the Adolescent Pregnancy and Parenthood Act focuses on the most vulnerable young people: those who give birth under the age of 18, have low income, or experience other barriers to services.

The adolescent family life demonstration projects were authorized in 1981. For each of the past 4 years, the authority has been $30 million; actual program appropriations have been less than half of this amount.

Mr. Speaker, adolescent pregnancy and parenthood is a serious and critical problem in our Nation today, and I believe the time has come to adopt a service program which will meet the pressing needs of these children who bear children.

The youth of our Nation is our future; for most, that future is bright, but, for some, that future holds little promise. This legislation will give teenage parents and their babies a chance to participate in the future. It will give them a chance at life.●

HEROISM IN THE GLENCOE FLOOD

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, I want to continue to recognize and honor individuals who showed great acts of personal heroism in the Glencoe Flood which affected the area I represent.

Mr. Joseph F. McKenzie of Glencoe helped to save the life of Hulda Raupach when he carried her to high ground from the mounting flood water on his shoulders.

Mr. Dan Bell of Johnstown helped rescue Mr. Carl Raupach by grabbing him and tying him to a tree. In doing so, Mr. Bell endangered his own life, was momentarily swept away and had to be rescued himself.

I am also enclosing for the information of the House of Representatives a recent article citing individuals who aided, and I particularly join in commending Ms. Nila Cogan who helped avert further disaster by notifying the county emergency management agency of the growing disaster.

I certainly send my personal congratulations along to these individuals and enclose the attached article on the flood situation.

The article follows:

[From the Somerset (PA), Daily American, Jan. 24, 1985]

GLENCOE FLOOD WAS RARITY, SAY OFFICIALS

(By Vicki Rock)

The August 13, 1984, flood in Glencoe and Hyndman was one of the rare daytime killer floods, according to Dave Sisk of the National Weather Service in Pittsburgh.

Most floods which take lives happen after 11 p.m., Sisk said.

Five persons died in Somerset and Bedford counties. Charles Lee Merkel and Pamela Sue Phillippi drowned in Glencoe. Killed in Hyndman were Robert Gibner and Samuel Leydig Jr., both of Hyndman, and Clyde Burley Jr., Bel Air, Md.

Nila Cogan, who lives in Wittenberg, Meyersdale RD 4, at the time of the flood, was one of the first people to notify the county emergency management agency that a problem was developing in the lower watershed, according to Sisk.

She recently received a special public service award from the NWS for her quick reporting of the heavy rainfall.

"If we have an ample lead time to give warnings we are able to minimize the loss of life and property," Sisk said.

The United States Geological Survey Water Resources Division has estimated such a devastating flood won't happen again in Glencoe and Hyndman for more than 100 years.

Wills Creek, which has an average flow of 183 cubic feet per second at Hyndman, tore through its stream at an estimated 19,400 cubic feet per second, according to the December issue of the "Pennsylvania Topographic and Geological Survey."

That is more than 100 times the average flow following a severe rain storm.

The rain gauge at the Verl Bittner farm near the headwaters of Wills Creek measured 7.5 inches of rain in a four-hour period, stated the survey, which is published by the state Department of Environmental Resources.

The storm was confined to the upper reaches of Wills Creek in Somerset County, according to the survey.

"It was characterized by a severe intensity acting over a small, sparsely populated area with an extremely high rate of stream erosion," it stated.

"The more populated downstream areas of Glencoe, Fairhope and Hyndman received very little precipitation, only 1.5 inches was recorded, but extremely heavy stream flow. Truck-sized boulders which hadn't budged much in 100 years were moved tens of feet or more downstream."

Lt. Gov. William W. Scranton III has sent letters to 11 individuals and organizations in Somerset County commending them for their assistance during the flood.

According to the Pennsylvania Emergency Management Agency, letters were sent to Nila Cogan; Tom Villeneuve, Glencoe; Somerset County Jeep Club; Sheriff Guy Davis; Merle D. Kimmel, American Red Cross representative; Somerset Community Hospital Paramedics; and the following volunteer fire departments: Meyersdale, Berlin, New Centerville and Rural, Windber and Hooversville.●

SOUTH AFRICAN LABOR RELATIONS REFORM ACT AND PENSION PLAN SOUTH AFRICAN INVESTMENT REPORTING ACT

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing two pieces of legislation designed not only to focus the attention of this body on the policy of apartheid as practices by the Government of South Africa, but also, and I believe more importantly, to foster a reexamination of this country's investment and labor policy toward South Africa, and hopefully to offer some positive alternatives to current policy.

The first bill I am introducing is entitled the "Pension Plan South African Investments Reporting Act of 1985." This bill will amend the reporting and disclosure requirements of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 [ERISA] to require, with specificity, that each employee pension benefit plan report to the Secretary of Labor describing the plan's investments in South Africa whether they are made directly or through the acquisition of a share or interest in a business enterprise in South Africa.

It should be understood that this proposal neither imposes a sanction against doing business in South Africa, nor does it prohibit private pension fund investment there. It does insure, however, that adequate and accurate information is available as to the extent of America's private pension fund investment in a country who's policies have incurred the condemnation of the overwhelming majority of world opinion.

This measure will allow us as a country to determine, on the basis of the obtained factual information, whether investment is South Africa is an appropriate use of such funds, or whether as a policy matter we wish, at some later date, to prohibit such investment. In addition, I hope it will draw attenton to the fact that the issue of apartheid is not something remote, an issue of another country and another culture, but rather that it directly affects each of us to the extent that those are our pension dollars being so invested. There is some projected evidence that "foreign investment has arguably strenghtened rather than mitigated apartheid." We are that "foreign investment" and we must face facts and decide whether that is an appropriate position for a nation that prides itself on a policy of "freedom and equality."

While the debate will continue over whether private pension funds should be consciously used for "social investment"; that is, to further the purpose of achieving specific and affirmative social goals, I believe we can ultimately unite in our view that our pension dollars should not be used to enhance repugnant labor and social policies. With hundreds of billions of dollars now available in our private pension funds, we must decide whether we as a nation want to be a part of apartheid or whether we take the high and moral road and back that choice with our pension dollars—or the absence thereof.

Working in tandem and with concomitant purpose, is the second piece of legislation that I have introduced today. It is entitled the "South African Labor Relations Reform Act of 1985." This measure directs the Secretary of Labor to investigate the labor practices and policies of South Africa, as compared to the internationally accepted labor standards as set forth in the listed convention's of the International Labor Organization. In addition, the Secretary is to investigate the extent to which the labor policies and practices of South Africa cause the export of capital and jobs from the United States.

Having made these findings, the Secretary is directed not only to report these findings to the Congress, but also to make specific recommendations on changes in U.S. policies and activities that could better promote labor practices in South Africa that more nearly conform to the above described international labor standards. In making these recommendations, the Secretary must include an analysis of the following proposed statutory revisions:

First, revising the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 to prohibit investment of pension funds in South Africa;

Second, revising the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to apply minimum wage, equal pay, and child labor restrictions to the employees in South Africa of U.S. companies;

Third, revising the National Labor Relations Act to prevent sanctions from being imposed on employees for refusal to off-load shipments from South Africa;

Fourth, revising title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to apply to the employees—or applicants for employment—in South Africa of U.S. companies; and Fifth, revising Federal education statutes to increase the amount of assistance available to South African students who have been subject to a denial of the rights described in section 2(a).

The keystone in South Africa's system of apartheid is a repressive labor system. It operates to deprive the back population of free access to employment and training; it is the predicate by which South Africa's law and policy declares that a person's racial classification determines what education and training he will receive and what job he will be allowed to perform and where. While we as a nation cannot directly force changes in South African labor law, we can by our acts, whether through government or as employers in South Africa or as buyers of its products, express our outrage over the denial of economic security and equality of opportunity so apparent in South Africa.

For the information of my colleagues, I am enclosing a section-by-section explanation of each of the bills I have introduced today.

SECTION-BY-SECTION

Section 1. Short title: South African Labor Relations Reform Act of 1985.

Section 2. Findings: (1) that all human beings, irrespective of race, creed, or sex, have the right to pursue both their material wellbeing and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity; (2) that the labor policies and practices of South Africa have severely and intractably abridged the exercise of this right; and (3) that the United States has an obligation to promote affirmatively and actively the exercise of this right by means that are peaceful and that are not counterproductive.

Purpose: To collect information and make recommendations to guide the Congress in the formation of United States policies and activities that will promote improved rights of labor in South Africa.

Section 3. Investigation by the Secretary of Labor which must include (1) a comparison of the labor practices and policies of South Africa as measured against the labor conventions of the ILO; Convention 87—"Freedom of Association and the Right to Organize"; Convention 98 —"Application of the Principle of the Right to Organize and to Bargain Collectively"; Convention III—"Discrimination in Respect of Employment and Occupation"; (2) the extent to which changes in United States policies and activities can promote labor practices and policies of South Africa that do not vary from such standards; and (3) the extent to which the labor policies and practices of South Africa cause the export of capital and jobs from the United States.

Section 4. The Secretary of Labor must submit his findings and recommendations in the next annual report submitted more than six months after the date of enactment.

The Secretary must include an analysis of the following proposed statutory revisions:

(1) revising the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 to prohibit investment of pension funds in South Africa;

(2) revising the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to apply minimum wage, equal pay, and child labor restrictions to the employees in South Africa of United States companies;

(3) revising the National Labor Relations Act to prevent sanctions from being imposed on employees for refusal to off-load shipments from South Africa;

(4) revising title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to apply to the employees (or applicants for employment) in South Africa of United States companies; and

(5) revising Federal education statutes to increase the amount of assistance available to South African students who have been subject to a denial of the rights described in section 2(a).

Section 5. Definition of the term "South Africa".

SECTION BY SECTION

Section 1. Short title: Pension Plan South African Investments Reporting Act of 1985.

Section 2. (a) Amends section 103(b) of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 by adding a new paragraph (5) which requires that as part of the existing reporting and disclosure provisions of paragraph (2) of section 103(b), and its required statement of assets and liabilities, that, in the future, private employee pension benefit plans subject to the Act, must include a separate schedule itemizing each investment it made in South Africa which either initially occurred during the plan year covered by the statement or with respect to which any funds were expended or received by or on behalf of the plan during such year, i.e. a long term investment purchased before the date of this act but for which a funds adjustment or a return on the investment was made after the date of enactment but during the plan year. The itemization must include: (1) the identity of each party; (2) a description of the asset to which the transaction relates; (3) the purchase or selling price, the rental, the interest rate and maturity date in the case of a loan or the extention of credit; (4) expenses; and (5) the cost of the asset, the current value of the asset, and the net gain or loss on the investment.

This section defines the term "South Africa" to be the Republic of South Africa; any territory under the administration, legal or illegal, of the Republic of South Africa; and the 'bantustans' of 'homelands', to which South African blacks are assigned on the basis of ethnic origin, including Transkei, Bophuthatswana, Ciske, and Venda.

This section also defines the terms "investment in South Africa" and "business enterprise in South Africa" which taken together will describe the types of investments and their relationship to South Africa that will trigger the reporting and disclosure duties under this Act. The term "investment in South Africa" includes: (1) the direct establishment of a business enterprise in South Africa, i.e. the fund invests directly in a South African enterprise; (2) the fund makes a direct loan or other extension of credit for the establishment of a business enterprise in South Africa, or (3) the fund invests in the securities of a business doing business in South Africa. The investment can include the acquisition of a share or interest in the business enterprise, the acquisition of a bond or other debt instrument issued by the business enterprise, a capital contribution in money or kind to the business enterprise, and the making of a loan or other extension of credit with a maturity of more than two years to the business enterprise.

Once the nature of the investment is analyzed it must then be determined that such investment relates to a "business enterprise in South Africa" for this is in essence the term for doing business in South Africa. A "business enterprise in South Africa" means: (1) any organization, association, branch, or venture which is located in South Africa which exists for profitmaking purposes or to otherwise secure economic advantage, and (2) reaches any "person" individual, partnership, joint venture, corporation, mutual company, joint stock company, trust, estate, unincorporated organization, association or employee organization) controlling any business enterprise described in (1) above, even if such person is not located in South Africa. The "person" shall be presumed to be in control if: (1) the person beneficially owns or controls (whether directly or indirectly) more than 35 percent of the outstanding voting securities of the business enterprise; (2) the person beneficially owns or controls (whether directly or indirectly) 25 percent or more of the voting securities of the business enterprise, if no other person owns or controls (whether directly or indirectly) an equal or larger percentage; (3) the business enterprise is operated by the person pursuant to the provisions of an executive management contract; (4) a majority of the members of the board of directors of the business enterprise are also members of the comparable governing body of the person; (5) the person has authority to appoint a majority of the members of the board of directors of the business enterprise; or (6) the person has authority to appoint the chief operating officer of the business enterprise.

The term "branch is also specifially defined in this section to mean the "operations or activities conducted by a person in a different location in its own name rather than through a incorporated entity". It is so defined so as to insure coverage where there is no controlled incorporated entity in South Africa (e.g. a wholly owned subsidiary located in South Africa) and where the corporate structure is located outside South Africa (e.g. in Rhodesia) but where such a corporation maintains extensive operations and activities in South Africa, (e.g. a loan officer with substantial funds available for business investment). In this example, any pension fund investment in the operations and activities in South Africa of the company in Rhodesia would be subject to the requirements of this Act.

Section 2. Amends sections 104(a)(2) and 110(a) of the Act to insure the applicability of this bill to all pension plans and that with regard to the specific reporting and disclosure provision of this bill there may be no alternative methods of compliance.

Section 3. Provides for civil enforcement against the plan administrator, or under certain conditions against "any fiduciary of the plan" for the failure to comply with the reporting and disclosure requirements of this bill. The amount of the civil penalty may not exceed $100 a day from the date of such violation and can only be assessed against the administrator or fiduciary in their personal capacities done so as to avoid penalizing the fund and its eventual pensioners. There is, however, no liability if the plan administrator or other fiduciary shows that the administrator acted in a good faith effort to avoid such violation as set forth in the bill.

Section 4. Effective date covers reports for plan years beginning after one year after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

LAND DISPOSAL AMENDMENTS OF 1985

HON. GLENN ENGLISH

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing some preventive medicine for the people of this Nation. The medicine is packaged as the Land Disposal Amendments of 1985 and is designed to encourage alternative disposal methods for hazardous wastes.

We are spending millions of dollars to clean up existing hazardous waste landfill dump sites, and I am hopeful that these efforts will be successful. There is, however, no guarantee that once existing sites are cleaned up that new, presently nonexisting, sites will not require additional future funding for dumpsite cleanups.

My legislation would prevent future sites from needing additional future cleanup funds. By banning the land disposal of all hazardous waste and by making available a portion of current Superfund money to make alternate hazardous waste disposal methods more economically attractive, I feel we can avoid the further buildup of landfill dumpsites which would otherwise require expenditure of enormous funds. I am convinced that companies which require hazardous waste disposal methods would choose methods other than landfill dumps if alternate disposal methods were more affordable. My bill would allow the use of Superfund money to equalize the costs and encourage alternate disposal methods. We can pay now or we can pay twice as much later. I feel this is clearly a case where prevention is the best cure.

The text of the legislation follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

This Act may be cited as the "Land Disposal Amendments of 1985".

SEC. 2. PROHIBITION OF LAND DISPOSAL OF HAZARDOUS WASTE.

(a) REPEAL OF 1984 PROVISIONS.—Section 3004 of the Solid Waste Disposal Act is amended by striking out subsections (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), and (i).

(b) NEW PROHIBITION.—Section 3004 of such Act is amended by inserting the following new subsection after subsection (a):

"(b) PROHIBITION ON LAND DISPOSAL.—Effective on the date of the enactment of the Land Disposal Amendments of 1985, the land disposal of hazardous waste listed or identified under section 3001 is prohibited.".

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—(1) Section 3004(m)(1) of such Act is amended by striking out "Simultaneously with the promulgation of regulations under subsection (d), (e), (f), or (g) prohibiting one or more methods of land disposal of a particular hazardous waste" and substituting "As promptly as practicable after the enactment of the Land Disposal Amendments of 1985".

(2) Section 3004(m)(2) of such Act is amended by—

(A) striking out the last sentence thereof; and

(B) striking out "any prohibition promulgated under subsection (d), (e), (f), or (g)" and substituting "the prohibition established under subsection (b)".

(3) Section 3004(o) of such Act is amended by striking out subparagraph (1)(A) and paragraphs (4) through (6).

SEC. 3. GRANTS TO EQUALIZE COSTS.

(a) GRANT AUTHORITY.—Subtitle C of the Solid Waste Disposal Act is amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

"GRANTS TO EQUALIZE COSTS OF TREATMENT AND LAND DISPOSAL

"SEC. 3020. (a) AUTHORITY TO MAKE GRANTS.—The Administrator is authorized to make grants to the owners and operators of hazardous waste treatment facilities to reimburse such owners and operators for a portion of the costs of construction and operation of such facilities.

(b) AMOUNT OF GRANTS.—The amount of any grant made under this section shall be an amount determined by the Administrator which is equal to the excess of the amount referred to in paragraph (1) over the amount referred to in paragraph (2):

"(1) COST OF TREATMENT.—The cost of construction and operation (over its estimated useful life) of the treatment facility for which such grant is made.

"(2) COST OF LANDFILL DISPOSAL.—The amount which the Administrator estimates it would cost to construct and operate a landfill in the same region to dispose of the same volume of hazardous waste as will be treated and rendered nonhazardous by the treatment facility.

"(c) FUNDS DERIVED FROM SUPERFUND.—Grants under this section shall be made from amounts available in the Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund established under section 221 of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980.".

(b) AMENDMENT OF SUPERFUND ACT.—(1) Section 221(c)(1) of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 is amended by inserting after "described in" the following: "(A) section 3020 of the Solid Waste Disposal Act or (B)" and by redesignating subparagraphs (A) through (D) as clauses (i) through (iv) respectively

(2) Section 221(c)(2) of such Act is amended by inserting after "shall be reserved" the following: "for the purposes specified in section 3020 of the Solid Waste Disposal Act and".

(3) Section 111(e)(2) is amended to read as follows:

(2) For reservation of 85% of certain amounts appropriated to the Fund established under title II for specific purposes, see section 221(c)(2).".●

AMENDMENT TO SOCIAL SECURITY

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing an amendment to title II of the Social Security Act to prohibit the payment of benefits thereunder to individuals who have been deported from the United States on account of certain activities conducted under the direction of or in association with the Nazi government during World War II.

This amendment plugs a loophole in the Social Security Act. The current law provides for the termination of benefits upon deportation of the primary beneficiary under 18 of the 19 grounds for deportation under section 241(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act. The 19th ground provides for deportation when an individual engaged in certain activities involving the persecution of persons during World War II in association with the German Nazi government. This ground was added as an amendment to the Immigration and Nationality Act in 1978. However, due to an oversight, the Social Security Act was not amended at the same time to include paragraph (19) as a basis for terminating benefits. Thus, a Nazi persecutor who is deported from the United States under paragraph (19) of the Immigration and Nationality Act may continue to collect Social Security benefits.

This situation offends my sense of fair play and justice. These individuals have already benefited by living in the United States and largely escaping detection all these years. They have never been brought before a tribunal for their crimes. In most cases, they never will. Yet, as the law stands now, they can collect Social Security. This is particularly unfair when individuals deported under the other 18 paragraphs of the Immigration and Nationality Act cannot collect Social Security.

To add insult to injury, this loophole is often used as a basis to plea bargain with these criminals. I am outraged that these criminals are enticed to admit to persecutions under paragraph (19) in order to continue to receive Social Security benefits.

Mr. Speaker, for thse reasons I am introducing this amendment and I urge the support of my colleagues. The text of the bill is below.

H.R. 933

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 202(n)(1) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "or (18)" in the matter preceding subparagraph (A) and inserting in lieu thereof "(18), or (19)".

(b) Section 202(n) of such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) For purposes of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection, an individual against whom a final order of deportation has been issued under paragraph (19) of section 241(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (relating to persecution of others on account of race, religion, national origin, or political opinion, under the direction of or in association with the Nazi government of Germany or its allies) shall be considered to have been deported under such paragraph (19) as of the date on which such order was issued or became final.".

SEC. 2. The amendments made by the first section of This Act shall apply only in the case of deportations occurring, and final orders of deportation issued, on or after the date of enactment of this Act, and only with respect to benefits for months beginning (and deaths occurring) on or after that date.●

FIRST NATIONAL BANK DECLARES WAR ON FEDERAL BUDGET DEFICITS

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, people across the United States are becoming fed up with Congress' inability to control its spending habits. This Nation is currently facing one of the most severe fiscal crisis that it has encountered since the Great Depression. The Federal debt, and the current budget deficit, must be reduced, and spending restraint is the primary solution.

As an indiction of the degree of concern over the Federal deficit, the First National Bank of Deerfield, located in my congressional district, has formally declared war on Federal budget deficits. The following article, drafted by the bank's president, Alan Meyer, reinforces the importance of Congress' actions to limit spending over the next year:

FIRST NATIONAL BANK DECLARES WAR ON FEDERAL BUDGET DEFICITS

How would you like to be able to borrow all the money you want, anytime you wanted to, and never have to worry because you could always borrow more to pay back what you already owe?

It sounds pretty tempting, doesn't it?

The policy makers in the federal government know how attractive it is. They have fallen to the temptation for more than two decades. And the only way to keep them from falling again and again is to take the temptation away. As the record shows, they cannot handle it.

Since 1961, the federal government has experienced 22 deficits and just one surplus in its budget.

As a result, it is more than $1.6 trillion in debt. Furthermore—if things don't change—it will be adding in the neighborhood of $200 billion to that debt year after year for the foreseeable future. At that rate, the total debt would double in just seven years.

If you divided $1.6 trillion among every man, woman, and child in the U.S., each individual would receive almost $7,000. That is almost $28,000 for the traditional family of four.

In 1982 prices, $1.6 trillion would buy more than 24 million new homes and almost 270 million new automobiles.

Furthermore, it would take nearly every dollar on deposit in domestic offices of America's banks to pay that debt off. In other words, we would almost wipe out all the savings in U.S. banks to pay the debt.

The numbers are frightening—but the speed at which the government has racked up this debt is even more frightening.

In 1970, the entire federal budget was $200 billion and the government had overspent by $2.8 billion. In other words, our current deficit just about equals all the money spent by the government just 13 short years ago.

Government deficits affect our everyday lives—they help determine how many Americans are working, how much the value of our dollar is eroded by inflation, and how difficult it is for businesses and consumers to get credit.

How?

These deficits must somehow be financed. To do this the government can borrow money or it can simply increase the amount of dollars in circulation.

If it borrows, it will absorb new savings needed for the private investment necessary to keep our economy moving and our standard of living rising: investment for plant and equipment, research, technology and consumer goods.

Traditionally, the federal government has used about one-quarter of our national savings pool.

If deficits continue at their current high level, this figure will be closer to one-half to two-thirds of that pool—year after year.

The obvious result of this course is that interest rates will be pushed higher and higher, since there will be greater competition for the same amount of funds. Think about that the next time you or someone you know wants to purchase a car or a home.

As an alternative to borrowing, the federal government may decide to finance its deficit by creating more money. Then we will suffer from inflation. In the classic economic definition, we will have more dollars chasing the same amount of goods.

When inflation is on the rise, no one has any incentive to save and invest. Industry becomes starved for capital, savers watch their nest eggs disappear and recession returns to the horizon. In addition, interest rates rise.

Whichever course the government takes to finance its deficit—borrowing, creating money or a mix of the two—interest rates rise, bringing higher unemployment in their wake.

Fortunately, since we live in a democracy we can deal with the deficits.

Democracies are vulnerable to deficit spending because it is far more pleasant to raise spending than to reduce it.

Elected officials know that Santa Clauses get re-elected and Scrooges get rejected.

In Scrooge's day, individuals who could not pay their debts were thrown into debtor's prison.

Our accumulated deficits are slowly, but surely, incarcerating our entire population—and our children for years to come—in what soon may become an inescapable debtors' prison. The walls of this prison are not made of brick, concrete and steel. Instead, they are composed of high interest rates, inflation, unemployment and sluggish investment.

Our key to escape can be found in legislation introduced in both the U.S. House of Representatives and the Senate that would provide for a congressionally initiated constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget. The requirement would not apply in case of national emergency.

This amendment is necessary to provide Congress with the incentive to make the tough decisions that must be made to eliminate the deficit. Without such direction, the Congress would continue to spend, spend, spend, far beyond the country's means.

For that key to work we must convince Congress to use it now, before we are locked into this debtors' prison forever.

A little more than two centuries ago, 58 Americans stood up to create this country. Now the members of the House and Senate must stand up to save it.●

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 124, TERM LIMITATION CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, the debate over the length of term to be served by Members of Congress is as old as our Republic and proposals to reform the system have been introduced in almost every Congress since 1869.

While we have adapted to our current system, it may serve us well to reexamine the question of tenure in light of the events that led to our Founding Fathers initial choice and in light of our needs in the 20th century.

Therefore, today I am reintroducing a constitutional amendment increasing the term of a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives from the present 2 years to 3, and limiting the number of consecutive terms Members may serve to six. In addition, my amendment limits to three, the 6-year terms of Members of the Senate and establishes a 6-year term for the Presidency.

History shows us that at the Constitutional Convention of 1787, the 2-year term emerged as a compromise between annual elections and a proposal for triennial elections supported by James Madison. Madison argued for a House term short enough to be responsive to a Member's constituents yet long enough to enable legislators to learn their jobs and carry out their public function. Although a compromise was forged, the long and impassioned debate over the term length question continued to be one of the great controversies throughout the ratification process of our Constitution. And, since the Constitutional Convention, approximately 211 constitutional amendments to lengthen the House term have been introduced.

Certainly, one would wish only to amend the Constitution if the reasons were imperative. Therefore, to explore the reasons, let us consult experience.

A recent article in the Washington Post entitled "Woes of a Hill Freshman" outlined the circumstances with which freshman Members contend as they assume their new responsibilities as legislators. As related in the article, information overload, managerial nightmares and the time-consuming need to raise money in order to win reelection quickly transform high expectations into a mantle of frustration. Unfortunately, this situation is not confined only to a Member's freshman year. We all grapple with the obstacles that detract from the wholehearted devotion to public service.

Under the current 2-year term, Representatives are often forced to be campaigners when their real choice is to be legislators. Many times the reelection treadmill impinges on the important time needed to develop informed judgments concerning today's complex issues.

Mr. Speaker, applied to the realities of a 20th century Congress, does our short 2-year term actually contribute to the best interest of democracy? The primary purpose of my proposed constitutional amendment is to allow Members to spend more time in the substance of their work which is framing the policies of our country and serving the people who sent them here. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this constitutional amendment so that we may give our fullest measure of skill to the citizens we all serve.●

IN MEMORY OF MORRIS BRYAN, JR.

HON. ED JENKINS

OF GEORGIA

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, too often we wait until death to pay tribute to someone who selflessly devotes time, energy, and personal and financial resources to others. We did not overlook paying public tribute to Morris Bryan. He insisted in life that we not turn the spotlight on him. He spent his life turning the spotlight on others, often after he had provided the stage, the props and the script.

When he died December 29, 1984, he left legacies in education, textile manufacturing, and athletics.

In education, he not only gave of his time serving 10 years on the board of regents of the University System of Georgia; in the Georgia Tech National Alumni Association in several leadership positions; as a trustee of both Brenau College and the Richard B. Russell Foundation; as a founding trustee of Gainesville Junior College; and for 35 years, as chairman of the board of Education of the Jefferson City School System in Jefferson, GA; he put his money into those educational systems, as well. He preferred to keep amounts of monetary contributions out of the headlines, but credit for the library, the football stadium, and the first all-weather track at Jefferson High, his alma mater, goes to Morris Bryan, Jr.

Conceiving, organizing and operating the Georgia Olympics for State high school track and field championships earned him the Georgia High School Association Distinguished Service Award in 1972. His other education awards included the 1975 Distinguished Service Award from Brenau College, the 1976 Georgia Tech Alumni Distinguished Service Award, the Sam Burke Award from the Georgia Athletic Coaches Association in 1977, the Service to Sports Citation in 1978 in the Georgia Athletic Hall of Fame, and in 1978, National Distinguished Service Award from the National High School Athletic Coaches Association and appointment to the Georgia Sports Hall of Fame Board of Trustees.

Morris Bryan's contributions in textile manufacturing gained him State, national, and international recognition and status. During his professional career as president of Jefferson Mills, Inc., he had served as president of the Textile Education Foundation of Georgia, president of Georgia Textile Manufacturers Association, president, vice president, director, and chairman of the education, membership, and economic committees of the American Textile Manufacturers Institute, Inc., director and chairman of the Sales Promotion Committee of the National Cotton Council, director and vice president of the Georgia State Chamber of Commerce, and at his death was a director of the Southern Industrial Relations Conference.

His reputation in the textile community, reflected in many positions he held, did not come by chance. His innovative engineering and construction design at his Jefferson plant showed the industry that the textile manufacturing environment could be made safe for the workers. OSHA developed its standards, using Morris Bryan's plant as an example. His exterior roof support construction eliminated cumbersome columns, which impeded the manufacturing process.

In his list of personal accomplishments, one can see marks of a leader. His leadership style encouraged others to join him in pursuits of goals. He saw potential in others and challenged it to be used. Those who accepted his challenges will continue his legacy.

For those of us who knew him personally, Morris Bryan was a gentleman's gentleman. His strong-willed approach put him among the true movers and shakers. His expertise and honesty put him in the role of confidential adviser to public officials from mayors, Governors and Congressmen to Presidents. And all this he did without publicity.

Even though he was a statesman in State, national, and international matters, he never lost personal contact or sight of his goals for his beloved home, Jefferson, GA. It was there he worked in community and civic groups and devoted most of his time, money and energy. And in death, his family honored that first obligation. His obituary requested that memorial donations be made to Jefferson High School Foundation or a favorite charity.

No doubt, many tributes will be paid to Morris Bryan; however, the silent, solemn gesture made on the day of his death could have meant no more to him. The flag on the Jefferson High School lawn flew at half-mast.●

51-059 O-86-12 (Pt. 2)

CONDEMNING ANTI-SEMITISM

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Ms. MIKULKSI. Mr. Speaker, religious tolerance was fundamental to the founding of this Nation. In fact, the guarantee of religious freedom is explicitly stated in our Constitution. Yet for too long our country has been enduring increasing incidences of anti-Semitic activity. This is abhorrent to the essential principles of our Nation. Anti-Semitism must be comdemned and combated, until it is no longer evidenced in America.

The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith recently released its audit of anti-Semitic activity. This study reveals that such activities are on the rise nationwide. In 1984, there were 715 reports of violence against Jews and Jewish institutions, compared with 670 in 1983. The B'nai B'rith report shows that my own State of Maryland ranks third in the country in the number of anti-Semitic attacks.

The increase in incidences also reveals a rise in more serious anti-Semitic crimes, such as bombing and arson. No one knows why there has been this increase in the country, or why Maryland should rank so high. But no reason can alleviate the horror of these incidences of religious terrorism.

In 1985 we commemorate the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi death camps. In November 1976 I went to Poland. I had read the lessons of history but I wanted to learn those lessons first hand. I went to the Warsaw ghetto where so much in some ways began. I was stunned by how small it was and envisioned the numbers of people packed into that space. I went to Auschwitz to see the camp, the barracks, the gas chambers, the liberation films. I never made it all the way through the tour. The bins of children's shoes broke my heart and I could go no further.

Then, during the Passover-Easter season in 1983 I revisited Israel and felt the sense of renewal that Auschwitz was not the final end. From Y'ad Vashem, the Holocaust Memorial, to the new settlements we celebrated the lives of the survivors—as we do today.

But we are also left with a legacy of warning: Zachor, remember. Remember the genocide. Remember those who were killed. Remember the religious persecution. Through remembrance of what did happen, and continued vigilance and public education, we can work to be free of anti-Semitism.

In Congress I am cosponsoring legislation to halt religious hate crimes. This bill, H.R. 665, will impose stiff penalties, including fines and prison sentences, for individuals committing acts of violence and vandalism against religious property.

Maryland has taken the lead in State action to address the problem of anti-Semitism. Maryland's coalition opposed to violence and extremism coordinates statewide programs. Maryland also passed legislation to establish sophisticated reporting procedures for religious terrorism.

The National Institute for the Prevention and Control of Violence and Extremism is a national research and education institute founded in Baltimore. This institute will centralize data collection and dispersal, will prompt research into the links between prejudice and violence, and will help develop models for States to use in response to religious terrorism and other violence motivated by prejudice. I urge my colleagues to see to it that their States support and work with the institute, and initiate efforts back home to combat anti-Semitism.

The B'nai B'rith audit chronicles the rise of violence against Jews in America. These incidences are motivated by ignorance and prejudice. As we remember the Holocaust, let's not forget to renew our efforts to wipe out current anti-Semitic activity. Zachor.●

NATIONAL COMMUNITY COLLEGE MONTH

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to recognize the contributions that community colleges have made to our Nation. This bill designates May 1985, as "National Community College Month."

Community, technical, and junior colleges educate more than half of all first and second year students enrolled in postsecondary institutions. They prepare people for employment in over 1,400 different occupations, usually within reasonable commuting distance for more than 90 percent of all Americans. The cost of going to community, technical, and junior colleges is low, with an average tuition of $501 a year. Black, Hispanic, American Indian, and Alaskan Native credit students are represented at higher than average population rates in these institutions, enrolling more than half of all minority undergradutes attending postsecondary institutions.

More than 97 percent of the congressional districts in the United States have at least one community, technical, or junior college, educating a total of over 11.41 million Americans in 1981 alone. For many of them it is their first, and sometimes only, chance for postsecondary learning—and they are of benefit to us all. I therefore urge my colleagues to support "National Community College Month" and join me in saluting them for all of their contributions to this great Nation.●

BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA

HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, throughout 1985 the Boy Scouts of America will celebrate the 75th anniversary of the founding of this organization with the theme—"Pride in the Past * * * Footsteps to the Future."

Observances during anniversary week, February 3-9, include a heritage campfire caravan; Scout jamboree in Fredericksburg, VA, for 30,000 Scouts; and a congressional breakfast in Washington, DC.

Membership in the Boy Scouts of America increased in 1984 for the fifth consecutive year. There are currently 4,773,000 Scouts and over 70 million have participated in Boy Scouts since its founding in 1910.

Boy Scouts of America continued to expand its programs last year. Sports has been introduced as an integral part of the program for Cub Scouts. A family camping association has been formed to enable families to use Scout camps. "Mom and Me" provides an opportunity for 8-, 9-, and 10-year-old boys to camp with their moms on weekends. Varsity Scouting showed a 30-percent growth during its first year. Explorers elected their own national youth president who has been appointed to the national executive board of the Boy Scouts of America.

The Four Rivers Council, serving the Second Congressional District of Kentucky, which I have the privilege of representing, has had a 20-percent increase in membership during the past year. The council has completed negotiations for continued use of Camp Roy C. Manchester and kicked off a $100,000 capital campaign for the camp. The council also increased service to young people in remote rural areas who were previously not served.

At this time I want to congratulate the Boy Scouts of America on its 75th anniversary. I am pleased to commend the Boy Scouts for their past accomplishments and I wish them further successes in the years ahead.●

LONG-OVERDUE PROTECTION FOR CIVIL SERVICE EMPLOYEES

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which I believe provides long-overdue protection for the many civil service employees in the excepted service. My bill will give excepted service employees the right to administrative due process when adverse personnel actions are taken against them—a right they do not now have.

A wide variety of positions in the civil service are excepted from the competitive process. These positions include attorneys, physicians, scientists, chaplains, handicapped workers, and certain midlevel administrative positions. Positions may be excepted from the competitive service by law, Executive order, or by the Office of Personnel Management. There are over one-half million excepted service employees in executive agencies.

Under current law, Federal employees in the competitive service have the right to receive advance written notice of an adverse action and to respond in writing to the action. They also have the right to appeal an adverse action to the Merit Systems Protection Board, an independent agency established by the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978. These procedures also apply to veterans' preference eligibles in the excepted service. However, all other excepted service employees have no way to defend themselves in an adverse action situation, even though they may have served in the Federal Government for many years. They may be summarily terminated without even knowing the reason for such an action.

The bill I am introducing, with my colleagues, Ms. OAKAR, Mrs. SCHROEDER, Mr. HOYER, and Mr. BARNES, will entitle employees in an executive agency who have served 2 continuous years in the excepted service to these same procedural rights when an adverse action is taken. The bill will not cover personnel in positions which are confirmed by the Senate, or are confidential or policy determining in character.

I strongly believe that excepted service employees will be better able to serve the American public if they are free from the fear of adverse actions taken against them without cause. The right to due process and to defend one's work and career is fundamental to all working men and women. Those in public service should be no exception to the rule.●

A MEMORIAL TRIBUTE TO JOHN W. JACKSON, JR.

HON. DENNIS M. HERTEL

OF MICHIGAN

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my deepest sorrow upon the loss of a close friend and loyal public servant, Michigan Assistant Attorney General John W. Jackson, Jr. Mr. Jackson was in charge of the Michigan attorney general's office in Detroit and, prior to that, represented the Michigan Department of Treasury.

John Jackson, Jr., was a dedicated professional and an exceptionally talented public servant. Mr. Jackson's accomplishments and contributions to Michigan's legal system are certainly impressive and will continue to have an impact on the legal process.

Over the years, many young lawyers, fresh out of law school, served in the attorney general's office and they always found a friend and confidant in John Jackson, Jr. I am proud to have been one of those lawyers.

Mr Jackson served the State of Michigan with tremendous patience, diligence, conviction, and dedication and always gave of himself to his fellow man. Mr. Jackson's honesty and integrity were the factors that set him apart from other public servants. John Jackson, Jr., was a great family man who dedicated his life to helping others. We thank God for sharing John with us. His quality of professionalism will live on in those he inspired by his example.

I join the fine people of the State of Michigan in paying our highest respect to John Jackson, Jr., and we sorrowfully extend our deepest sympathy to his wife, Berniece, and his son, Javon. We greatly appreciate the outstanding contributions of John Jackson, Jr., to the State of Michigan. He will always be remembered in our prayers.●

THE SECONDARY SCHOOLS BASIC SKILLS ACT

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to join my colleague, PAT WILLIAMS of Montana, in reintroducing the Secondary Schools Basic Skills Act. I would urge my colleagues to join us in supporting this effort to provide necessary funding for assisting local education agencies with large numbers of economically disadvantaged students in upgrading their basic skills.

Mr. Speaker, our Nation's secondary schools are in the midst of an economic and academic crisis. Secondary schools across this country are experiencing increased dropout rates, and more and more high school students are unable to pass the required basic skills tests necessary not only for graduation but also for functioning in an increasingly complex society and work environment. The President's Commission on Excellence in Education focused our attention to educational studies that have indicated that proficiency in basic skills of reading, writing, and comprehension has seriously faltered over the past 20 years. At this time, it is estimated that 23 million Americans, and approximately 13 percent of all 17-year-olds, do not have adequate reading, writing, and comprehension skills to function in everyday life. Last year, in my own State of New Jersey, over 50,000 entering college freshmen took the New Jersey College Basic Skills Test. Less than a third proved proficient in verbal skills and only 12 percent were proficient in elementary algebra.

Despite this proven need in our Nation's high schools for increased attention, our secondary schools are receiving very little funding to strengthen their basic academic program. Department of Education analyses indicate that 77 percent of chapter 1 funds are invested in preschool, kindergarten, and lower elementary grades. Our secondary school students are being neglected to the detriment of their future and our country's future.

To correct this inequity, the Secondary Schools Basic Skills Act would provide secondary schools with a 6-year authorization of $900 million annually to upgrade their basic skills program. Any secondary school in which 20 percent of the student body is economically disadvantaged, would be eligible for funding. The funds would be used for the benefit of all students at that school that are classified as low achievers, and not merely those low-achievers that are also economically disadvantaged. Funding would be discontinued at the end of 2 years if that school could not demonstrate progress in improving the basic skills of its student body. We have however included a 1-year waiver provision if extenuating circumstances precluded an improvement within the space of 2 years.

During the 98th Congress, when Mr. WILLIAMS and I introduced this bill, two concerns were expressed by educators relating to the authority of the National Institute of Education [NIE] to administer the program and with the discontinuation of funding if the school could not demonstrate an improvement after 2 years. We have modified our new bill to address these concerns by eliminating the provision establishing a National Secondary Schools Basic Skills panel under NIE authority and placing the program directly under the supervision of the Department of Education and the Secretary of Education. This should eliminate further layers of bureaucracy and hopefully accelerate the decisionmaking and evaluation process. We have also allowed for extenuating circumstances by empowering the Secretary of Education to grant 1-year waiver for schools whose circumstances warrant additional time.

Our country's future rests in the ability of our youth to function and succeed in our society. The lack of basic skills precludes any such success and can only spell disaster for our country. I urge my colleagues to support this worthwhile effort.●

A GREAT MAN IN MICHIGAN

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is a special pleasure to make note of 25 years of dedicated and selfless public service to the people of our area on the part of Robert McLachlan. His remarkable record includes being an active member in the Lions, Elks, Masons, Moose, Shrine, Knights Templer, and Goodfellows.

Besides being the clerk for the city of Dearborn Heights, he is the city's representative to the Peoples Community Hospital Authority and the Central Wayne County Sanitation Authority. He is past president of the Wayne County Municipal and Township Clerks Association and the Michigan Association of Municipal Clerks.

It is highly appropriate that Members of Congress and others be aware of this remarkable example of a gentleman who has maintained his dedication and interest in serving our citizens in a remarkable variety of ways. So often we take for granted people who serve in these offices with no thought or expectation of having public notice or attention. Therefore, I think it is fitting and proper that we now take a moment to give special accolades and thanks to Robert McLachlan and to wish him well in the years ahead.●

STRENTHENING FEDERAL WHISTLEBLOWER PROTECTIONS

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, the Merit Systems Protection Board, which is charged with determining the validity of complaints by Federal employee whistleblowers of act of employer reprisal, recently issued a report which found that, despite the existence of the Board, most Federal employees who know firsthand of instances of waste, fraud, or abuse still fail to report them. The reasons given by these employees were: First, their belief that nothing would be done to correct the situation; and second, their fear of reprisal by their superiors if they reported wasteful or illegal activities taking place in their agencies.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps such findings would not have been surprising before the enactment of the 1978 Civil Service Reform Act, which created the Merit Systems Protection Board [MSPB] and a Special Counsel's Office to prosecute cases of Federal employer reprisal against whistleblowers. One of the major purposes of that legislation was to provide assurances to Federal workers that they would be protected from acts of reprisal if they reported instances of waste, fraud, or abuse known to them. The Civil Service Reform Act was intended to encourage Federal employees to come forward when they know of illegal or abusive practices taking place within their agencies. Unfortunately, the Merit Systems Protection Board's recent report has verified what many of us already suspected—that if anything, Federal employees are now more frightened of possible employer reprisal if they report any instances of waste, fraud, or abuse than they were in earlier years. The report found that in 1983, 69 percent of those Federal employees who said they knew firsthand of some example of Government waste failed to report it. That was approximately the same percentage found in a similar survey conducted in 1980. Of those who knew of waste but did not report it, 37 percent in 1983 gave fear of reprisal as a reason for keeping silent. In 1980, that figure was only 20 percent. Of those who reported their findings to superiors, 20 percent of them in 1980 said they subsequently suffered reprisal, in the form of a demotion, a poor performance rating or losing a promotion. In 1983, 23 percent of those reporting such incidents said they subsequently suffered reprisal—a notable increase over the 1980 figure.

Clearly, the findings contained in this report indicate that the creation of the Merit Systems Protection Board and the Office of the Special Counsel have not succeeded in assuring Federal employees that they will be protected if they report wasteful or illegal practices at work. And just as clearly, the report suggests that employees' fears are well founded. Whistleblowers are not adequately protected under the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978. Under that law, a Special Counsel was created to receive complaints by Federal whistleblowers of employer reprisal, investigate such complaints, and, if the complaint is found to have merit, to argue before the MSPB that such whistleblower's superior committed an act of reprisal in response to having had the whistle blown on him or her. The Board then decides whether an act of reprisal was in fact committed and, if so, what relief is appropriate.

Unfortunately, in practice this arrangement has not been as effective in successfully prosecuting offending Federal employers as Congress intended. There are several reasons for this. Often, the Special Counsel has an almost insurmountable burden to overcome in proving his case, and while agencies have the right to appeal unfavorable Board decisions on behalf of an accused supervisor, the Special Counsel currently lacks the authority to appeal a board decision against the whistleblower.

I am convinced that such appeal authority is crucial if the Special Counsel is to be able to successfully prosecute those cases where his investigation has revealed an act or acts of employer reprisal.

During the 98th Congress, I, along with Congressman BARNEY FRANK, introduced legislation which would authorize the Special Counsel to appeal unfavorable Board decisions to Federal court. Our introduction of this legislation followed a hearing by the House Manpower and Housing Subcommittee in which we heard from a Federal worker employed at the Kittery Portsmouth Naval Shipyard in my district who had been reprimanded by his supervisor for pointing out safety hazards at the shipyard to the Occupational Safety and Health Administration. My constituent's experience pointed up the need to protect Federal employees from employer reprisal for reporting health or safety hazards, as well as instances of waste, fraud or abuse. The day after our August 9 hearing, Congressman FRANK and I introduced our legislation.

A similar bill was introduced in the Senate by CHARLES GRASSLEY, and was eventually passed by the Senate in an amended version. Unfortunately, the House adjourned for the year before it had a chance to vote on the bill.

The legislation we are introducing today, and which Senator GRASSLEY has again introduced in the Senate, incorporates the minor changes which were made to last year's bill by the Senate. In addition to granting the Special Counsel authority to appeal unfavorable MSPB decisions to Federal district court, our bill would permit the aggrieved employee to intervene in the Special Counsel's action as a matter of right. The bill would also give the Special Counsel authority to enforce subpoenas and protective orders pursuant to his or her investigative and prosecutorial authority.

Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that our legislation will be considered early in this session of Congress. Enactment of our bill will encourage would-be whistleblowers throughout the Government to come forward by increasing the authority currently available in the Special Counsel to prosecute those who commit acts of reprisal against such employees. And by encouraging more whistleblowers to report known waste, fraud or abuse in their agencies, our bill will indirectly benefit all the taxpayers in this Nation who are currently footing the bill for such practices.●

A TRIBUTE TO HERBERT E. LOCKHART

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention and to that of my colleagues, the name of a remarkable Virgin Islander whose accomplishments have won him recognition not only in my district, the U.S. Virgin Islands, but as far away as Sweden. The man to whom I am referring is Herbert E. Lockhart, a member of one of the most distinguished families in the U.S. Virgin Islands. For the past 33 years, he has served as the Swedish Counsel to the Virgin Islands, a longer term than any other Swedish Counsel in the United States. This achievement combined with his superlative work, led to his being awarded the honor of commander of the Royal Order of Polar Star by Order of the King of Sweden. It was conferred on him by the Swedish Consul General who made a special trip to our islands for this tribute to Herbert Lockhart.

I salute Herbert E. Lockhart, an illustrious Virgin Islander who has earned the respect and love of his community.●

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation to repeal the interest and dividend tax compliance provisions of Public Law 98-67.

On August 5, 1983, Congress repealed the 10-percent withholding provisions on interest and dividents. However, in their place, Congress accepted backup withholding and reporting requirements nearly as onerous to payers and payees as those repealed. These backup provisions were the price Congress had to pay to see the 10-percent withholding repealed. Through H.R. 852, I now seek to complete the repeal process and return us to prewithholding reporting requirements. Specifically, sections 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, and 109 of the Interest and Dividend Tax Compliance Act of 1983 are repealed by this bill.

Foremost in my rationale for sponsoring this legislation is the belief that the people of this country are opposed to greater Government intervention in their lives. The reporting and compliance provisions of Public Law 98-67 allow the Government to intrude into the private financial relationships between individuals and businesses. This intrusion into the private financial affairs of tax-abiding citizens is hardly justified by the increased ability of the IRS to track down tax-delinquent citizens. Granted, only the guilty suffer the legal penalties of these provisions but the public's opposition to these measures is motivated by its value of privacy, not the concern for being found guilty of tax evasion. Most taxpayers honestly report their income and have no fear of being accused otherwise. Congress must recognize and act to preserve the privacy that this country regards with such conviction.

In addition to the privacy argument made above, my rationale for repealing the backup withholding provisions includes the belief that financial institutions and businesses should not be forced to be tax collectors. The Internal Revenue Service has been given the authority to collect taxes levied by Congress and it, not the financial institutions and businesses, should bear the burden of this responsibility. Tax collection should be between the IRS and the taxpayer. Forcing the task of tax collection onto third parties complicates their operations and requires them to absorb added expenses. It should be noted that section 103 of the Interest and Dividend Tax Compliance Act, which appropriates additional revenues for purposes of collecting tax, remains unchanged by this bill. If Congress wants better tax compliance, it should use the IRS as its vehicle and properly equip it to do the job.

In closing, I cannot stress strongly enough the need for Congress to evaluate our Nation's regard for privacy and the role of the IRS as our Nation's tax collector. In light of this evaluation, I urge all Members to consider and support H.R. 852.●

A TRIBUTE TO MR. ERIC STAHLBERG

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to share with my colleagues some of my thoughts on one of my constituents. It is always a pleasure to have the opportunity to honor such a devoted man. Eric Stahlberg has dedicated his life to community service. As a nationally known pioneer in fabricated plastics, he worked for the Pre Corp., in Florence, MA, for over 40 years. His last 13 years with them, he served as their vice president for manufacturing and operations, before his retirement in 1982. He has been said to be involved in a lifelong love affair with plastics.

Mr. Stahlberg is known around Florence as a "good neighbor." He has been active in the United Way, the regional YMCA and the Clarke School for the Deaf. Besides working hard for various community organizations, Mr. Stahlberg also works hard not to let people know all that he has done.

Since childhood, one of Mr. Stahlberg's greatest passions has been the Boy Scouts of America. Coincidentally, the Great Trails Council's boundaries, which is the area of most of Mr. Stahlberg's work, almost fully coincide with my congressional district. Mr. Stahlberg was the first young boy in this region to be awarded the high scouting honor of Eagle Scout. That was some 50 years ago. Since that time, Mr. Stahlberg has dedicated a great deal of time to giving back to the Boy Scouts that which he feels he received from them. He has held various voluntary positions with the Great Trails Council, including serving on the district council, organizing activities and chairing fund raising drives.

Mr. Speaker, it has been my pleasure to honor Eric Stahlberg, a fine businessman and citizen.●

TRIBUTE TO JAMES AND MARGARET LA GRECA

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, in our fast-paced world often we don't stop and take the time to appreciate those things which are truly valuable in our lives. Few would argue with the fact that the American family is a central institution in our society. Today I rise to pay tribute to one family in particular, James and Margaret La Greca of Garfield, NJ, who have celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary.

As parents, the La Grecas were blessed with two kind and caring children. Now fully grown, Marilyn and James, Jr., have families of their own. The grandchildren, Cindy, Susan, Lenny, Danny, Jimmy, and Jeff, are a constant source of happiness and pride for James and Margaret.

Active in town affairs, both James and Margaret have been a constant source of inspiration for their neighbors. Whether through their involvement in the Democratic Party or Elks Lodge events, they have provided strength for each other and service to the community of Garfield.

Let us look to the example of James and Margaret La Greca, who through their 50 years together have proven that bonds of friendship and love are everlasting, and from those bonds, good things grow.●

CARL SANDBURG HIGH SCHOOL

HON. HARRIS W. FAWELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 4, 1985

● Mr. FAWELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to commend the Carl Sandburg High School in Orland Park, IL, for being selected as one of the Illinois nominees in the National Secondary School Recognition Program for 1984-85.

The purpose of the National Secondary School Program is to identify and call attention to a national group of schools that are unusually successful in meeting the educational needs of the students. Carl Sandburg High will now compete with schools from every State in the Union for the National Excellence in Education Award. Those schools receiving this award will be announced in June.

I am proud a high school in my congressional district has been deemed worthy of the nomination. I am certain my colleagues will join me in congratulating the faculty and staff of Carl Sandburg High School for contributing to the success of meeting the educational needs of its students.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, February 5, 1985, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

SENATE—Tuesday, February 5, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, January 21, 1985)

The Senate met at 2 p.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chaplain is unavailable today. The distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. DANFORTH] will open the Senate with a prayer.

PRAYER

Senator JOHN C. DANFORTH, of Missouri, offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Our Heavenly Father, we give You thanks for many blessings in this life and especially for the privilege of living in this wonderful country; and for the opportunity to serve it in a public way. We ask for the gift of perseverence in our task, for personal humility as we perform this service, and for tolerance of one another, that through our efforts, Your kingdom may be accomplished.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me first indicate to my colleagues what we may accomplish today.

There are three special orders for not to exceed 15 minutes each, as follows: The distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER], the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], and the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN].

Following the execution of the special orders, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond 3 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

Following the completion of routine morning business, it will be the intention of the leadership to go into executive session to consider the nomination of William J. Bennett to be Secretary of Education, hopefully with a time limitation of 1 hour or less, though it may be more. A rollcall vote is expected on the confirmation of William J. Bennett.

It is my hope that when we recess today, we will recess until 12 noon, Wednesday. There is a series of special orders, about seven, for tomorrow for 15 minutes each. Then there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

It is also my hope that fairly early tomorrow afternoon we can take up the nomination of Donald P. Hodel to be Secretary of the Interior and John S. Herrington to be Secretary of Energy. I think Mr. Herrington has an appointment to see the distinguished minority leader some time tomorrow afternoon. Hopefully following that meeting, that nomination will be in order. Then we will have completed our business and will stand in recess until 8:30 p.m., Wednesday evening, for the President's State of the Union Message.

Of course, we are also working on a highway bill which is of considerable interest to the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. SYMMS]. There may be additional announcements later on today.

Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes of my time to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTEN].

(The remarks of Mr. KASTEN appear at a later point in the RECORD.)

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, do I have 10 minutes under the standing order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRADLEY].

(The remarks of Mr. BRADLEY appear at a later point in the RECORD.)

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, does any other Senator on this side wish me to yield at this time?

If not, Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR SPECTER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Chair.

HEALTH COST CONTAINMENT ACT OF 1985

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today I am introducing the "Health Care Cost Containment Act of 1985." This legislation is designed to confront what has become a national crisis—the disappearance of affordable health care in the United States

By any statistical measure, the cost of adequate health care costs is on the rise, far outstripping the ability of most Americans to pay for it. Last year, the health care component of the Consumer Price Index rose by 6.2 percent, more than 1½ times greater than the national inflation rate. The average cost of a semiprivate hospital room in the United States has increased 150 percent since 1976. Total health care costs were $355 billion, fully 10.8 percent of the gross national product.

Unchecked by market forces or regulation, escalating health care costs burden consumers in several punishing guises. There are higher taxes for Medicare and Medicaid. Health insurance premiums steadily rise, with annual increases of 20 to 30 percent in recent years. And aggregate higher health care costs ultimately fuel inflation at the expense of the quality of life of all Americans.

Health care is not a luxury. It is a basic necessity of life that cannot be allowed to slip inexorably out of the financial reach of American families. The Health Care Cost Containment Act of 1985 offers a useful step in controlling these costs.

Essentially, the legislation provides a limited antitrust exemption to accomplish two results. First, it would allow health care insurers to collaborate in collecting health care data on the costs and quality of care rendered by health care providers such as hospitals and clinics. This information base would promote better consumer choices on health care while spurring competition among the providers of such care. Second, it would allow insurers to enter into agreement with providers clearly stipulating the level and cost of health care, thereby promoting competition within the health care industry and giving further clarity to consumer decisions on how to choose health care most efficiently.

This legislation recognizes that it is the health care insurers, or so-called third-party payors of health care costs, that are in a good position to restrain costs. Consumers lack enough information under the present systerm. A limited antitrust exemption will enable insurers to more accurately assess costs, so that they may intelligently deal with health care providers. This will redound to the benefit of all consumers.

In order to ensure that this exemption only promotes joint activities which actually will help contain costs, the bill authorizes the Attorney General to investigate all joint conduct provided hereunder. The bill provides that, if the Attorney General determines that the joint conduct fails to contain costs or unduly restricts competition, he shall order the cessation of such activities. This investigatory and remedial power would effectively deter potential abuses of the limited antitrust exemption the bill provides.

The exemption is designed to override any conflicting State law which would prevent health care payors from engaging in the activities designated in the bill. It is not intended to supersede State hospital cost control statutes or insurance laws which do not conflict with the bill's purpose, but which may impose additional duties or responsibilities on payors or providers.

The magnitude of the health care cost control problem compels Government and private business to take unusual steps to reach solutions. Antitrust exemptions are not suggested lightly. But in order to control costs and to promote competition, this narrow exemption appears to be warranted.

Since the Federal antitrust laws have been enacted, they have been of enormous benefit to our Nation in promoting competition. As a variety of economic problems have arisen, it has been appropriate to restructure and clarify the antitrust laws in order to promote the national interest.

On June 26, 1984, the Committee on the Judiciary held a hearing to consider the proposed exemption in this bill. The committee received testimony detailing the reluctance of health care insurers to act jointly to restrain costs, absent an assurance that such joint action will not subject them to charges of anticompetitive activity. The legislation I introduce today would provide such assurance, while protecting against potential abuses or undue restrictions on competition in the delivery and financing of health care services.

The committee also received testimony from the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice raising technical and policy questions about the proposed legislation. Their concerns and valuable suggestions are under review, and will be addressed in due course. Perhaps further consideration will result in refinement or modification of this legislation. Given the urgent problem of exploding health care costs, however, we must not delay our efforts to fairly and reasonably facilitate cost containment.

This legislation is not a panacea for the problem of exploding health care costs, but it is a reasonable first step toward cost containment, a problem deserving our urgent attention.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 379

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this bill may be cited as the "Health Care Cost Containment Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) the spiraling costs of the United States health care system requires cooperation among various private sectors to control those costs;

(2) the public interest requires that health insurers and other payors who reimburse recipients for the expense of health care, or pay providers directly on behalf of such recipients, be encouraged to work together to contain the cost to recipients; and

(3) the health care cost spiral appears not only to be part of the national inflation in the cost of living, but also to exceed other inflation rates; and

(4) insurers and others have cooperated in the limited collection, exchange, interpretation and use of data on the delivery of and charges for health care services, with a salutory effect on health care costs; and

(5) it is desirable that such cooperation continue and that the right to engage in further cooperative efforts to contain health care costs be clarified.

SEC. 3. As used in this chapter—

(a) "Health care provider" means an individual, group of individuals, hospital, clinic, partnership, corporation, association, company, firm or any other form of business enterprise which provides medical and other health services, or any association of such health care providers.

(b) "Insurer" means any individual, group of individuals, partnership, corporation, association, company, firm or any other form of business enterprise authorized to do the business of insurance or administer insurance under the laws of the United States or of a State, territory, district, or possession thereof, or any association of such insurers.

(c) "Health care services" means any item or service defined in 42 U.S.C. section 1395x (b), (c), (d), (f), (g), (h), (i), (j), (m), (n), (p), (q), and (s), all as amended.

(d) "Person" means an individual, group of individuals, partnership, corporation, association, company, firm or any other form of business enterprise.

SEC. 4. The antitrust laws, as defined in section 1 of the Clayton Act, and the Federal Trade Commission Act, shall not apply to any activity undertaken (either directly or through a third party or parties) individually by an insurer or other person engaged in making payments with respect to charges for health care services or jointly among such insurers or such persons for the purpose of—

(a) acquiring, processing, reporting or analyzing information relating to the quality, cost or utilization of health care services, including reasonable and customary levels of charges for such services, or collecting, distributing, publishing or using analyses or interpretations of such information;

(b) collecting and distributing insurance claims for health care services; or

(c) negotiating, entering into or acting upon agreements with health care providers with respect to the utilization of health care services or the levels of charges or reimbursement for health care services.

SEC. 5. (a) Activities permitted by this Act may be investigated at any time by the Attorney General for the purpose of—

(1) determining whether the activities under investigation are subject to the Act; or

(2) determining whether such activities have had the effect or will have the effect of increasing the cost of health care services or unduly restricting competition in the delivery or financing of health care services.

(b) In the event the Attorney General undertakes an investigation, all persons engaged in the particular activity that is the subject of the investigation shall be given notice thereof in writing. The Attorney General shall conduct his investigation in conformance with procedures to be established by him pursuant to section 553 of title 5, United States Code. If the Attorney General determines after the conclusion of such investigation that an activity does not comply with the requirements of this Act, he shall give written notice of such determination, which notice shall—

(1) include a statement of the circumstances underlying, and the reasons in support of, the determination; and

(2) state with specificity any actions required in order for the activity to come into compliance.

(c) If persons engaged in the activity under investigation fail to take the actions specified by the Attorney General within sixty days, he shall commence an action in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia to restrain and prevent the offending activity.

(d) In the event the district court finds that the venture or program is in violation of the requirements of section 4 or 5 of this Act, such court shall order the cessation of such activity.

(e) Any party aggrieved by the determination of the district court may, within thirty days of such determination, seek review by the court of appeals on the grounds that such determination is erroneous.

(f) Information generated in the course of any investigation or court action, or submitted by any person in connection therewith, shall be exempt from disclosure under section 552 of title 5, United States Code.

(g) Neither a determination by the Attorney General pursuant to subsections (a) and (b), or by the district court or court of appeals pursuant to subsections (d) and (e), nor any statements, opinions, or recommendations issued in connection therewith, shall be admissible in evidence in any administrative or judicial proceedings in support of any claim under the antitrust laws.

SEC. 6. This Act shall supersede any law of any of the several States that might otherwise prohibit the actions authorized within, the intent of Congress being to encourage payors or health care services to assist in containing health care costs.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for a quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

WHAT SHOULD CONGRESS DO ABOUT FEDERAL DEFICITS IF WE HAVE A RECESSION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, making generally favorable economic assumptions, the administration's budget document tells us that this year—1985—the deficit will come in at about $222 billion. That would be the biggest Federal Government deficit in American history, by far. What will the Federal deficits be in 1986 and succeeding years? The administration says they will be very big but they will steadily decline to about $80 billion in 1990. That prediction is worth about as much as a guess on what number will win the Maryland lottery tomorrow. It is worthless.

Consider: We know from vivid recent experience that administration estimates of future deficits are not exactly reliable. Four years ago, the administration estimated that by 1984 there would be no deficit. The Federal budget would be in balance. Was it? How wrong can you get. That is like forecasting to your spouse that your new diet will take off 15 pounds in the coming year. But, lo and behold, when you step on the scales at the end of the year, you weigh not 15 pounds less but 30 pounds more. Obviously, if you announce that you have another new diet that will take off that 30 pounds you just put on, your spouse is not going to place any bets on the results of the new diet.

So why will the administration be wrong again? There are many reasons to suspect that the Federal deficit will not decline in the next 5 years. It will not. It will grow. Consider all the developments that stand in the way of the forecast decline in the Federal budget: First, the Congress may not agree to the administration's recommendation to cut programs for the poor, the middle-class, and American business.

The President is absolutely right that these recommendations will encounter the fiercest kind of opposition. The mail will soon begin to flood into my office and other congressional offices; the visits from sincere and concerned Wisconsin people protesting any cuts in their education, welfare, health, small business, job creation, farm, legal services, revenue sharing, Federal civilian pay, veterans' pensions will be coming on like gangbusters. House and Senate Members all over the Hill will be receiving the same kind of imprecations: "Don't cut our program."

In the past, Congress has not stood up to these pleas from back home voters. Congress has caved in. Will it cave in again? This time it will be tougher. In the past, Presidents have never asked for the kind of comprehensive across-the-board reductions or elimination of just about every program on the book. I think the President has done the right thing in asking these reductions and eliminations. If he can win congressional support for his request, it will be an extraordinary achievement and to his credit. Unfortunately, the odds are against him.

But it gets worse. Even if the President makes a clean sweep and gets every last cut he requests, the prospect of reducing the deficit in the next 5 years will be unlikely. Here is why: The administration assumes that the country will enjoy a steady period of 4 percent growth without recession for 5 more years. At the very same time, Congress reduces the Federal Government's highly stimulative fiscal policy. The present recovery is already past its 27th month. It has already lasted longer than most recoveries. No one has repealed the business cycle. In the next couple of years we are likely to have a drop in growth below 4 percent and a recession. If we do, there will be two blows to the administration's aim of reducing the deficit.

First, the recession will cut revenues. That will stop any deficit reduction as Federal revenues fall. Also, the recession will increase Federal spending for unemployment compensation and welfare—automatically. Second, the recession will destroy the congressional and maybe even the Presidential will to cut spending. Costly job creation programs, credit relief programs, and a burst of spending bills to get-the-economy-moving-again will be all but inevitable. This Senator will predict that if we encounter another recession in the Reagan term, the President will even call for and probably get another tax cut. So revenues will drop further. Before we emerged from the next recession, the country would easily face a $300 or $400 billion deficit as we race on our way to a $3 trillion national debt.

Economists are in such ill repute today that the economic fraternity has not even speculated on what policies we should follow if the business cycle has not been repealed and we do move into a recession accompanied by deficits that hover at the $200 billion level at the beginning of the recession. Do we grit our teeth, close our eyes, and tough it out, holding down spending until the recession runs its course? Or do we follow the old New Deal program of public works and widespread subsidies to industry and agriculture to push recovery along? Or do we really go all out, as America did in World War II, when the Great Depression was finally overcome with deficits that were a mammoth 25 percent of the GNP for 3 straight years?

Congress and the country seem to be breezing along with a popular President—hoping for the best—but with no realistic contingency plans for the most likely economic development: a recession any time in the next 3 or 4 years. Let us think about it.

BUDGET DEFICIT ESTIMATES USUALLY WIDE OF THE MARK

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, an article by Robert D. Hershey, Jr., which appears in today's New York Times, reiterates the point I have made several times that the official estimates of the Federal deficit have been fantastically wrong over the years.

As the article points out, in only 5 of the past 16 years has the error in projecting the Federal deficit been less than 50 percent.

Given the fact that every administration wants to show that it is doing a great job of fighting the budget deficit, it is not surprising that in only 5 of the past 16 years was the actual deficit lower than the projected one.

Mr. Hershey's article discusses some of the economic and political problems of projecting a deficit.

As we begin the monumental task of reviewing and revising the fiscal year 1986 budget, we would be wise to remember that the deficit estimates are often frighteningly underestimated.

I ask unanimous consent that the article from the New York Times, "Any Way You Figure, It's Political," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 5, 1985]

ANY WAY YOU FIGURE, IT'S POLITICAL

(By Robert D. Hershey, Jr.)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4.—For all its apparent precision, with neat columns of numbers, some of them refined to the decimal point for years as far distant as 1990, the Federal budget for the fiscal year 1986 that was officially sent to Congress today is of relatively little use to those who want to know such basics as how spending, revenue and the deficit will actually turn out.

Frequently, in fact, an Administration's figures will prove almost grotesquely wrong.

When President Reagan presented his first budget in early 1981, for example, the deficit for the next fiscal year was put at $24.1 billion. When the 1982 fiscal year ended, the actual deficit was $110.6 billion.

But that was not an isolated case. In only five years of the past 16 has the margin of error on the deficit been less than 50 percent.

There now seems to be broad recognition that budgets, above all, are statements of a President's political goals, many of which have no chance of being legislated in Congress. Politics apart, budget outcomes also depend on forecasts of what will happen to the nation's economy.

"Probably the bulk of the error over time is due to errors in economic forecasting," Rudolph G. Penner, head of the Congressional Budget Office, once observed. Even policy makers, he said, are not sufficiently aware of the critical role of the underlying economic assumptions, which have often gone awry.

For example, few if any economists foresaw the depth of the 1982 recession, the main reason revenue fell 12.7 percent, or $90.1 billion, short of the initial forecast for that year.

In the past 16 years, the average error for revenue has been 4.4 percent, while the average for outlays has been 3 percent. Even relatively small errors in these, however, can have a huge effect on the deficit, particularly when receipts and outlays move in opposite directions.

The deficit itself, as one banker puts it, is really an intersection of two guesses: the forecast for receipts and the forecast for outlays.

Although the President's budget makers acknowledge this problem, and even offer tables showing the sensitivity of basic figures to economic change, nobody really knows what the economy will do. Forecasters as a group have had a particularly dismal record in recent years, even as they have made rapid gains with the aid of computers.

RECESSIONS AND BOOM PERIODS

Recessions have the effect of both reducing the Government's revenue and raising its spending. Those thrown out of work, for example, pay little or no income tax and often begin to draw unemployment compensation. Booms, on the other hand, have the opposite effect, a fact crucial to Mr. Reagan's argument that the country can largely "grow" its way out of deficits.

A meaningful reading of the budget starts with the realization that it is not an accounting statement so much as the expression of political goals.

And it is always biased on the side of optimism. "It has to be optimistic because it has to show things getting better because of what the President wants," says Stanley E. Collender, a former Congressional aide who is director of Federal budget policy for Touche Ross & Company, the accounting firm.

The Congressional Budget Office tries to remove undue Presidential optimism by recalculating the budget on the basis of different, frequently more conservative economic assumptions. But this stops short of trying to predict whether Congress will adopt policy changes.

Then there are the many problems in calculation not directly related to the economic forecast. How many of the unemployed, for example, will be eligible for unemployment benefits or welfare? How many will actually claim benefits? How fast will a military contactor build a new bomber and bill the Government for payments? Will there be a drought or other natural disaster that will require increased payments to farmers?

Of the economic assumptions, perhaps none have been more crucial than the inflation rate, which is notoriously hard to predict. Its sharp rise in the 1970's had the effect of pushing people into progressively higher tax brackets. This revenue bonanza was removed Jan. 1 with automatic adjustment of tax brackets to offset wage inflation.

Nevertheless, inflation creates budget uncertainties because many Federal benefits, including Social Security, are keyed to it and because it has a strong effect on interest rates and the Government's debt burden, the budget item now showing the fastest rate of growth.

Moreover, the unreliability of nearly every budget number increases dramatically as the forecasters try to peer further into the future.

Thus, the budget, especially since Mr. Reagan came to office, says Mr. Collender, is probably best regarded as little more than an "opening political salvo."

IS IT POSSIBLE TO NEGOTIATE ARMS CONTROL TREATIES WITH THE SOVIETS?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, there is a faction in the administration and a faction in the U.S. Senate that believes that the United States is wasting its time trying to negotiate arms control agreements with the Russians. Why do they oppose arms control negotiations? The reason is simple. The faction says we can not trust the Russians to keep the agreements. This faction believes that the Russians will cheat whenever they have the chance to cheat. The antiarms control faction believes that the Russians have cheated again and again and again on arms control and will always cynically use it to restrain the United States. They believe that significant arms control treaties cannot be made "cheat proof." They believe that, since our economy is almost twice as big and productive as the Soviet economy, since our scientists are generally well ahead of Soviet scientists in the nuclear arms technology race, and since the NATO countries enjoy and even more decisive advantage over the Warsaw Pact countries both in economic strength and technological expertise, we should forget about arms control and go all out to win the arms race.

Well, why not? This no-arms-control faction sees the telling factors in a nuclear arms control race as: Economic strength, technological capability, and the will to use both to succeed. They contend that we have a massive lead in the first two ingredients, and they are convinced that if the American people can understand this, this Nation can develop the will—and that is all it will take. Why is this analysis, which shows our side as the clear winner, not right? And if it is right, why is not the conclusion that we should not fear but welcome an arms race that we would surely win also right? What is the answer? The answer is that the first analysis is right. We do, indeed, have a far more productive economy than the Soviets. NATO, indeed, enjoys an even greater advantage—close to 3 to 1 over the Warsaw Pact economies. Our advantage in nuclear weapons technology is at least as decisive as our economic superiority.

If this country developed a unified public will to outproduce the Soviet Union in every single nuclear weapons that were category and develop weapons that were less vulnerable, more accurate, more reliable, we could certainly do so. We would win the arms race. But then what? Would we be more secure or less secure? The obvious answer may be the wrong answer. In an all-out, unrestrained, go-for-broke race, let us assume that we could increase our 25,000 nuclear warheads to 200,000; that we could produce the ICBM's, the bombers, and the submarines all equipped with super advanced missiles, computerized with maps in their brains to thread through any radar or other obstacles, under any defensive net, and hone right on target. And suppose the Russians could produce only 50,000 warheads, with proportionately fewer ICBM's, bombers and submarines. Assume further that their guidance systems were inferior, less accurate, less reliable by a factor of 5 or 10. And assume that we had an equivalent advantage in conventional forces.

Would all this make peace more likely because of our much greater strength? The answer is "No." All of this would add nothing to our present security. Here is why: The Soviets fully understand that any nuclear attack by them on this country would mean a death warrant for both countries. There is no conceivable circumstance in which a preemptive nuclear attack by one superpower on the other would not, right now, today, result in the total destruction of both. It would be a double knockout. No winners. Two total losers. The Soviet Union knows that. We know it. Deterrence works. We do not need the arms race to acheive that deterrence. We have it now.

But, you ask, if we can not lose the arms race by any measure, how does it lessen our security if we continue it? The answer: We lessen our security for two reasons. First, the more vast, complex and numerous our neclear arms, the more likely it is that someday, someone, somehow will make the fatal mistake: A computer misinterpretation, a low-level conspiracy to start such a catastrophe, or even a suicidal impulse by a superpower leader.

Second, and much more likely, is the influence a continued, all-out nuclear weapons competition is likely to have on the spread of nuclear weapons to other countries. As the years go by and the super powers pour ever more scientific genious into the refinement and advance of these grim weapons of destruction, the weapons will become cheaper, smaller, and far more available to dozens of countries that today cannot afford them. The super power arms race is the vital ingredient in the future spread of nuclear weapons power. If we continue this race, somewhere, sometime in the next 10 or 20 or 30 or 50 or 100 years, nations in all parts of the world will have advanced nuclear weapons. Meanwhile, human nature with all its hostilities and aggressions is unlikely to change very much. So nuclear wars will break out. That is where the nuclear arms race surely leads.

Oh, yes, indeed. Arms control is risky. It is untrustworthy. It is dangerous. But it offers a chance of human survival. the nuclear weapons arms race does not.

THE UW-MILWAUKEE'S HOLOCAUST CURRICULUM

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee has announced a new curriculum designed to enable teachers to educate their students about the Holocaust. The program is being developed through the Holocaust Resource and Information project of the department of comparative literature at the university. The first of its kind in the United States, it is geared toward secondary and adult educators. The course for teachers is divided into an overall understanding of the topic and the second part will emphasize models and strategies for teaching it. The course will be ready for implementation in the fall of 1985.

The UW-Milwaukee should be commended for taking the first step in educating both teachers and students about the Holocaust. It is imperative that we understand how such an atrocity like the Holocaust could be committed. Why is this course such a good idea? George Santayna answered this question when he wrote, "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to fulfill it." As age takes the survivors of the Holocaust, we will lose their personal testimony about man's ability to be inhuman. But through education, we can alert each generation to the fact that genocide is an ever present danger. We can see that this dark episode from the past is remembered so that it is not repeated again.

The U.S. Senate must also do its part by doing all that's feasible to make sure a crime like genocide is never committed again. We can do this by ratifying the Genocide Convention and once and for all making this heinous crime illegal and punishable. Six million Jews died senselessly during World War II. It is our duty to make sure a despicable incident like this is never repeated. I urge the Senate to ratify the Genocide Convention this session.

REVOLVING DOOR ACT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am introducing a measure today providing for a 2-year cooling off period before Federal contracting personnel can accept employment with a firm over which they had contracting authority.

One inherent flaw with Federal procurement is the desire of some Federal procurement officials for high-paying jobs with companies they come into contact with in carrying out their official responsibilities. In fact it is well documented that many such officials go to work immediately after leaving Federal service for companies over which they had specific contract responsibility.

I have introduced similar legislation many times since I first came to the Senate more than 25 years ago. However, the need for such legislation has never been more pressing than it is today. Never before has the Federal Government been responsible for awarding more money to American industry. Never before has it been more imperative that this money be spent wisely.

The revolving door through which Federal employees pass on their way to private-sector jobs is wide open and growing. In 1984 companies doing $10 million or more in Pentagon business employed more than 2,100 Defense Department employees who had left Government service within the past 3 years. That is a 63-percent increase over the number they employed just 6 years earlier and more than three times what it was in 1975. Last year five major defense contractors—Martin Marietta, TRW, Hughes Aircraft, Boeing and Northrop—together employed almost 500 of these former Federal officials alone.

There have been numerous reports of inept contract management resulting in billion dollar cost-overruns, production delays, and procurement errors. Companies involved in these incidents make undeserved profits at the taxpayers' expense.

Consider the case of the Divad antiaircraft gun. Companies involved in designing and manufacturing that weapon hired three former Army lieutenant generals who, before retirement, had been involved in the Divad research program. One helped formulate the Army's requirements for the system while he ran the Air Defense Command. These companies also hired five additional lower ranking Army officers who had been involved in Divad testing. One, a test manager, assumed the exact same position with a contractor 3 months after the contract award.

In such cases, there is a temptation for a contracting official to be less than zealous when bargaining on behalf of the Government with his prospective employer. The right of the American taxpayer to an objective and independent evaluation of every Government contract must take precedence. There simply is no room for even the appearance of influence peddling.

My bill, a similar version of which passed the Senate unanimously in 1977, would close the loophole by imposing a cooling-off period on Federal employees at the GS-13 level and above, forcing them to wait at least 2 years before taking a job with any firm receiving a contract in which they had been substantively involved. Only the last 3 years of an individual's Federal employment would be subject to the provisions of this law. This legislation also would make the Office of Personnel Management available to advise individuals and contractors in cases involving potential conflicts of interest. Violators of this law would be subject to stiff fines, imprisonment, or both.

Mr. President, I strongly urge the Senate to act this year to approve this reform legislation. We can no longer tolerate costly conflicts of interest. We need to slam the "revolving door" shut.

Mr. President, when this bill passed the Senate in 1977 as an amendment to the Defense Production Act of 1950, it came out of the Banking Committee. I am therefore calling this to the attention of the Senate Parliamentarian. I understand that, under the rules, the Senate Parliamentarian makes his own judgment on this, and he should. But I wanted to remind him that, in the past, the Banking Committee has had jurisdiction, and I hope he will give that consideration this time.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 385

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Acquisitions Officers Ethical Counduct Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. As used in this Act, the term—

(1) "excutive agency" means—

(A) an executive department (as defined by section 101 of title 5, United States Code);

(B) an independent establishment (as defined by section 104 of title 5, United States Code), except that it should not include the General Accounting Office;

(C) a military department (as defined by section 102 of title 5, United States Code); and

(D) the United States Postal Service;

(2) "acquisitions officer" means any employee of an executive agency who, by virtue of his position or appointment in accordance with applicable agency regulations, is authorized—

(A) to solicit or select sources of supply,

(B) define or describe requirements for, audit, award, modify, terminate, or make determinations or findings with respect to, or review, certify, or evaluate contractor performance under any contract, or

(C) to exercise any part of such authority, and who is paid a rate of basic pay not less than the minimum rate of basic pay provided under the General Schedule for grade GS-13;

(3) "compensation" includes any payment, gift, benefit, reward, favor, gratuity, or employment valued in excess of $50 at prevailing market price;

(4) "contractor" is any person, partnership, corporation, or agency thereof, other than the Federal Government (including the independent agencies of the Federal Government) or the District of Columbia, who offers, negotiates, agrees, or otherwise contracts to supply the Federal Government (including the independent agencies of the Federal Government) or the District of Columbia, with goods, services, or supplies, and includes any parent, subsidiary, or affiliate of such person, partnership, corporation, or agency thereof; and

(5) "procurement contract" is any agreement in an amount greater than $25,000 by which the Federal Government (including the independent agencies of the Federal Government) or the District of Columbia purchases, leases, or otherwise acquires supplies, services, or other material, including an order for the procurement of services or supplies, an award, a notice of award, a contract of fixed price, an incentive contract, and a cost or cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract, a contract providing for the issuance of job orders, task orders, or task letters under the contract, a letter contract, a letter purchase order, or any agreement that is supplemental to any of the foregoing.

SEC. 3. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this subsection, an acquisitions officer who at any time engaged, personally and substantially, in duties of his office in regard to any procurement contract shall not accept compensation from any contractor receiving funds under such contract for a period of two years after the date of termination of his employment with the Federal Government (including any independent agency of the Federal Government) or with the District of Columbia. This subsection shall not apply with respect to any duties performed by such acquisitions officer more than three years before such date of termination. This subsection shall not apply to any acquisitions officer who is involuntarily separated from the service other than for cause or charges of misconduct, delinquency, inefficiency, or for failure to be selected for a higher grade.

(b) Whoever violates subsection (a) shall be guilty of a felony and shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year or both.

(c) Whoever knowingly and willfully offers, tenders, or grants any compensation to any acquisitions officer the acceptance of which would be a violation of subsection (a), shall be guilty of a felony and shall be fined not more than $25,000 and imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

SEC. 4. In any criminal or civil case brought against any person for a violation of section 3, it shall be a defense that—

(1)(A) the Office of Personnel Management issued an advisory opinion pursuant to section 5(b) finding that the acceptance of compensation alleged to violate such section would not violate the intent of such section; and

(B) such person fully complied, without alteration, with the understanding of circumstances as expressed by the office in the advisory opinion and any accompanying statement of findigs of fact, and with any additional guidance or suggestions proposed by the office; or

(2) the Office of Personnel Management did not file a timely advisory opinion, in accordance with the provisions of section 5(b)(1) or 5(b)(2).

SEC. 5. (a) An acquisitions officer who is offered compensation that might place him in violation of section 3(a) may, before accepting such compensation, apply to the Office for advice on the applicability of this Act to such compensation. Such application shall be made jointly by the acquisitions officer and the contractor who proposed to grant such compensation. The application shall include a full and complete description of the duties of such applicant during the last three years of his employment as an acquisitions officer, any official responsibilities such applicant exercised with regard to any procurement contract in which an interest is or was retained by the contractor proposing to provide such compensation, and a description, by a representative of the contractor, or the complete terms and conditions of the proposed compensation, including any prospective services that such applicant will perform on behalf of the contractor. Promptly upon receipt of such application, the Office shall publish a notice of the receipt of the application in the Federal Register.

(b)(1) Not later than ten days after the date the Office receives an application pursuant to subsection (a), the Office shall issue an interim advisory opinion stating whether the payment and acceptance of compensation referred to in the application would violate the intent of section 3. Pending issuance of a final advisory opinion, payment and receipt of such compensation may be temporarily authorized if the Office of Personnel Management states in the interim advisory opinion that, based on the initial review, the Office concludes that the payment and acceptance of such compensation would not result in a violation of the intent of such section.

(2) Not later than thirty days after the date the Office receives an application pursuant to subsection (a), the Office shall issue a final advisory opinion stating whether the payment and acceptance of the compensation referred in the application would result in a violation of the intent of section 3.

(c) The Office may find that the proposed compensation would not violate the intent of section 3 if—

(1) the involvement of the applicant, as an acquisitions officer, in a procurement contract in which the contractor proposing to grant the compensation was involved was so remote or inconsequential that it could not have had a significant effect on the procurement contract in question;

(2) the involvement of the contractor in such procurement contract was remote or inconsequential; or

(3) the national interest requires that, the prohibitions of this Act notwithstanding, such applicant should be allowed to accept such compenstion.

(d) Pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Director of the Office of Personnel Management, interested parties are permitted to present information or comments relating to the issuance of any advisory opinion under this section.

(e) The Director shall inform Congress, and publish a notice in the Federal Register within thirty days after the date the Office issues an advisory opinion pursuant to subsection (b), describing—

(1) the name of the applicant for such advisory opinion;

(2) the contractor from which such applicant intends to accept compensation;

(3) the duties of such applicant during the last three years of his employment as a contracting officer;

(4) any official responsibilities such applicant exercised with regard to any procurement contract in which an interest is or was retained by the contractor proposing to provide such compensation;

(5) a description, by a representative of the contractor, of the complete terms and conditions of the proposed compensation, including any prospective services that such applicant will perform on behalf of the contractor; and

(6) a statement of the findings of fact and opinion which led the Office to conclude that such compensation would or would not violate the intent of section 3.

SEC. 6. (a) The Office of Personnel Management shall coordinate and review the implementation and administration of this Act. In consultation with the Attorney General, the Administrator of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy, and appropriate heads of executive agencies, the Director of the Office of Personnel Management is authorized to issue regulations and to review the regulations of executive agencies, as approrpiate, to implement and administer this Act.

(b) For the purposes of implementing and administering this Act, each executive agency shall cooperate with the Office of Personnel Management and furnish information, appropriate personnel, with or without reimbursement, and such financial and other assistance as may be agreed upon between the Office and the executive agency.

(c)(1) The Office may hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, administer such oaths, and require by subpena or otherwise the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents as the Office considers appropriate to carry out this Act.

(2) In the case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena, issued under paragraph (1), by any person who resides, is found, or transacts business within the jurisdiction of any district court of the United States, the district court shall have jurisdiction to issue, at the request of the Director of the Office of Personnel Management, to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Office, to produce evidence if so ordered, or to give testimony on the matter under inquiry. A failure of any such person to obey any such order of the court may be punished by the court as a contempt thereof.

(d) All meetings to consider applications for an advisory opinion on the applicability of section 3 shall be open to the public, and a verbatim transcript of all such meetings shall be available for public inspection during regular working hours at the Office of Personnel Management.

(e) Whenever the Director of the Office of Personnel Management learns of an act appearing to involve a violation of section 3 or any other similar provision of Federal law, the Director shall promptly report the act to the Attorney General and shall furnish the Attorney General such assistance as may be required. The Attorney General shall report to the Director and to the Congress on the disposition of any such case.

(f) The Director shall review all executive agency programs to assure that all positions subject to the provisions of this Act are identified and that all persons subject to such provisions are provided adequate notice of prohibitions and restrictions set out in this Act.

(g) The Director shall transmit to the Congress an annual report on all activities, deliberations, and investigations under this Act, and shall recommend such legislation or regulatory actions as he considers appropriate to promote high ethical standards for Government employees to whom the Act applies.

SEC. 7. This Act—

(1) shall take effect with respect to compensation accepted on or after October 1, 1985; and

(2) shall not apply with respect to employment with the Federal Government (including an independent agency of the Federal Government) or the District of Columbia that was terminated before such date.

SEWALL WRIGHT'S REMARKABLE CONTRIBUTION TO GENETICS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, 30 years ago at the age of 65 Sewall Wright was required to retire from the University of Chicago as a professor of zoology because of age. He came to the University of Wisconsin as a member of the university's genetics department, until again he had to retire—this time 25 years ago when he reached the age of 70. Mr. President, those 25 years since Professor Wright retired to emeritus status at the age of 70 were so remarkably productive that he has just, a month before his 95th birthday, been awarded the Balzan prize in Rome, Italy, and the $100,000 that accompanies the prize. In winning the Balzan prize, Wright joins such luminaries as psychologist Piaget, composer Hindemith, zoologist Ernst Mayr and Mother Teresa. At the age of 93 Wright published the last of his four volumes, "Evolution and the Genetics of Population." He did not begin publishing the series until he was 79 years old in 1968.

Wright has been called the most influential evolutionary theorist of the 20th century. In a recent article on Professor Wright, Jerry Pockar reports on the remarkable quality of Wright's mind today at the age of 95. Pockar writes:

When he is asked about genetics or other aspects of science, his gentle shyness opens and there is suddenly a torrent of information, all precisely remembered and articulated, each date, personality and scholarly issued given its proper place.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Pockar's article from the Wisconsin State Journal of December 24, 1984, which is a remarkable tribute to a great American be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENETICIST, 95, ROSE QUIETLY TO TOP

(By Jerry Pockar)

Sewall Wright turned 95 on Friday.

On Nov. 15 he flew to Rome, Italy, where he was awarded the Balzan Prize and the $100,000 which accompanies it.

Though the prize has received scant attention in the U.S. media, it is an award of high international distinction.

On winning it, the University of Wisconsin-Madison emeritus professor of genetics joined the winners of the award who include psychologist Piaget, the composer Hindemith, the zoologist Ernst Mayr, and Mother Teresa. The recognition is not surprising given Wright's 10 honorary degrees and his stature as, in the estimation of one historian of science, "The most influential evolutionary theorist of the 20th century."

If recognition is not surprising, Wright continues to be.

The latest of his more than two hundred scientific papers was published this summer. Twenty-three years after he reached the mandatory retirement age at the University of Chicago, he published the last volume of his four volume "Evolution and the Genetics of Population."

He didn't begin publishing the series until the age of 79 in 1968. The longevity of Wright's 75-year career in science is extraordinary, but the quality of the man who labored all those years to unravel the mysteries of gentics is more remarkable.

At age 7, Wright wrote a pamphlet title, "The Wonders of Nature." If the young scientists' biological grasp of chicken gizzards, squash and marmoset monkeys indicated he was still in need of education, he had announced his calling.

The line of his progress over the next 88 years was essentially unbroken, although his humanist educator father discouraged young Sewall's scientific bent, and he did take a year off to work as a railroad surveyor in, what was then, the Wild West of the South Dakota Badlands,

From Lombard College with its student body of 65 in Galesburg, Ill., Wright moved through graduate study at the University of Illinois, Cold Spring Harbor Laboratory in New York and then Harvard. Ten years at the United States Department of Agriculture labs were followed by 29 years as a professor of zoology in Chicago. In 1954 he was forced to retire at Chicago, so he came to the UW-Madison genetics department where he served until he began his productive professor emeritus years in 1960.

A skeletal itinerary of his scholarly years doesn't begin to capture the texture and richness of Wright's achievements.

He hadn't heard of Mendelian heredity until his senior year at Lombard in 1910. Mendel's work had been rediscovered only in 1900, and in the first decade of the century there weren't enough geneticists in the world to fill a good-sized laboratory.

Before 1920 Wright was on the cutting edge of genetic investigation. By 1931, with the publication of his seminal paper, "Evolution and Mendlian Populations," he had become recognized as one of the primary shapers of evolutionary theory.

Over the next half century he tirelessly refined the central ideas of his life's work.

He had no eureka moment, no single discovery of the order of Einstein's Theory of Relativity or Watson and Crick's double helix. Wright was one of a number, a small number, of evolutionary theorists who pieced together important segments of the puzzle Charles Darwin first brought to the attention of the world.

Wright's contribution to the still evolving solution required experimentally breeding thousands of guinea pigs, following complex lines of mathematical reasoning through the thickets of experimental evidence, collaborating on and debating the issues over the course of decades.

One of Wright's primary ideas is that chance happenings in small genetic populations may have important effects in modifying gene frequencies, independently of natural selection. This is known as the "Sewall Wright Effect," and that effect is a central component in Wright's "shifting balance" theory of how various forces interact in determining evolutionary directions.

If the above two sentences are "Greek" to most newspaper readers, there may be consolation in noting that as recently as this decade Wright has entered the scientific arena to explain and defend his complex argument against serious misunderstandings by some fellow geneticists, misunderstandings which have persisted for more than a half century.

Nonetheless, the Balzan Prize, the honorary degrees and his many other honors, such as the prestigious Darwin Medal, testify that, though the debates may continue, there has long been a consensus within the scientific community as to the value and validity of Wright's work in evolutionary theory.

Wright's esteem is not, however, solely based on his work as an evolutionist. At the USDA he laid the principal groundwork for the modern science of livestock breeding. There isn't an agricultural school or animal breeding service in the world which doesn't rest, however indirectly, on his scholarly shoulders.

Moreover, the path analysis theory he developed in the late teens of the century has had a profound impact not only in genetics and other biological sciences, but also in psychology, econometrics, sociology and political science.

Wright's contributions in evolutionary theory, animal breeding and mathematics were the reasons why he received the Balzan Prize.

But the man, his personality and values, have also had powerful effects within the scientific community. He is famous for his generosity in helping other scientists. He has commonly reworked all the calculations and interpretations in papers sent to him by young scientists.

Wright's colleague at the UW-Madison genetics department James Crow, tells of the time Crow brought one of his students to Chicago to see the renowned geneticist.

The student verbally submitted twelve carefully prepared questions to Wright, and to each question Wright laconically replied that he did not know the answer.

As the Madison visitors returned home the student commented that if Wright were the greatest population geneticist, the field was in deep trouble.

Several days later the questioner received a 14-page letter, tight with calculations, in which all the problems posed had been carefully worked out.

Crow also tells how the National Science Foundation offered Wright a cost of living adjustment in the stipend he was receiving while writing his four volume series on evolution.

According to Crow, Wright's response was that "his productivity was declining at a rate which he calculated to be about the same as the decrease in the value of the dollar and that he did not deserve an increase. He never accepted it."

The shy, determinedly modest nonagenarian, now lives at the Oakwood Village, 6209 Mineral Point Road. Louise, his wife of 54 years, died in 1975.

At 95, Wright has lost much of his sight, a limitation which recently made it impossible for him to continue his work. This physically slight man, who was denied life insurance in his youth because of his damaged lungs, walks miles each day.

And when he is asked about genetics or other aspects of science, his gentle shyness opens and there is suddenly a torrent of information, all precisely remembered and articulated, each date, personality and scholarly issue given its proper place.

William Provine, a historian of science at Cornell University, recently completed a lengthy biography of Wright. The last sentence of the manuscript reads, "He is a great man."

Mr. President, I yield such time as may be required to the Senator from Arkansas if he wishes my remaining time.

Mr. BUMPERS. I think the Senator from Oklahoma is entitled to recognition at this point.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BOREN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Oklahoma is recognized for a time not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Arkansas such time as he requires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

(The remarks of Mr. BUMPERS are printed in the RECORD under Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.)

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for yielding.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

SCHEDULE FOR VOTES ON NOMINATIONS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. President, earlier I indicated there might be a vote today on the nomination of William Bennett.

There will be no vote today on that nomination. The vote will occur tomorrow.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. BUMPERS. I am sorry. I was not paying attention. Did the majority leader discuss the Meese nomination or the Hodel or Herrington nominations?

Mr. DOLE. I discussed all those earlier, and since I discussed the Hodel, Herrington, and Bennett nominations with the distinguished minority leader, it is our hope we will dispose of those, hopefully all three, tomorrow.

The Meese nomination will hopefully come to the floor on February 19.

Mr. BUMPERS. I thank the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

THE CRISIS IN AGRICULTURE

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, a few days ago, speaking in the Chamber about the unparalleled crisis facing American agriculture, I indicated that I intended to take the floor each day that the Senate was in session to talk about the very critical situation that now faces the agricultural sector of our country.

Several other Senators have indicated that they are also going to join in that effort to try to bring to the attention of the American people, Congress as a whole, and of the administration the emergency that we face, an emergency in the agricultural sector that could well spill over and impact the rest of the economy as well.

Because of our very serious concern about the emergency which we now confront, the junior Senator from Nebraska, Senator EXON, and myself sent a letter to the majority leader, Senator DOLE, on February 1. I wish to quote from the letter.

DEAR MAJORITY LEADER: The agricultural economy is facing an imminent collapse which has already begun to threaten the entire economy of this country including main street businesses, rural banks, and other institutions.

We and others have been working on a major farm credit bill which will be introduced soon. It is imperative that Congress enact a meaningful package for farm credit. An emergency farm credit bill is absolutely necessary. It cannot be delayed.

In all fairness, we wanted to let you know that after the February recess, we will be prepared to take whatever parliamentary steps are necessary to delay consideration of all other matters on the Senate floor until action is taken on an effective farm credit package. We will be encouraging others to join us in this effort.

It is signed by myself and the junior Senator from Nebraska, Senator EXON.

We are taking this action because of our belief that we cannot afford to wait. We are doing research on proposals of our own at the present time, and we are consulting with other Senators in regard to these proposals.

After the February recess, we also expect and hope to have the opportunity to sit down with the majority leader to see if action can be scheduled at a very early time and, as our letter clearly indicates, we are prepared to take whatever parliamentary steps that are at our disposal to bring the attention of the Senate to this issue and to prevent action on other matters which might be pending before the body until action is taken on effective farm credit legislation or until we have the assurance that an effective proposal will be brought before the Senate for a vote of the full Senate in a timely fashion.

I wish to very briefly bring to the attention again today of the entire body and of the country some of the figures, the statistics, which tell the story in a dramatic way of what is going on in the farmlands of America.

Over the past 3 years, land values have declined in real terms by 22 percent in the United States, and, in some counties, lands have fallen by as much as 50 percent in value.

In the 10th Federal Reserve District, land values have fallen between 26 to 30 percent.

Over the past 4 years, equity in American agricultural land declined by more than $150 billion.

Total farm debt equaled $12.5 billion in 1950, while, in that year, total net farm income was $19 billion.

By 1984, however, farm income in constant dollars had fallen to $5.4 billion compared to $215 billion in total farm debt.

Over the past 5 years, bankruptcies and forced liquidations have increased by 200 percent.

It is possible, in some States, that between 10 and 15 percent of all farmers, by some estimates, could go out of business before the end of 1985.

This compares with an average of between 1 and 2 percent of farmers going out of business over the past decade.

Again, Mr. President, I ask: If farm values have declined by 25 percent in 4 years, when we have been losing between 1 and 2 percent of our farmers per year, can we imagine what will happen to land values in this country if 10 to 15 percent of the farm units are forced into liquidation in a single year?

Can we imagine the impact on the banking sector? Can we imagine the impact on the rural communities of this country? And can we imagine the domino effect that these results and these developments will finally have on the total economy of this country, the great urban centers, the great financial centers, as well, before the ripple effects are finally ended?

Loan losses at agricultural banks reached 0.9 percent of total outstanding loans in 1983, up from an average of 0.2 percent in the 1970's. Over 4,100 U.S. banks have at least 25 percent of their total loan portfolios committed to farm and ranch loans. There were 79 bank failures in 1984, 40 of which occurred after June 15, 1984. Four of the thirty-nine which failed before June 15 were agricultural banks. Twenty-two of the forty that have failed since June 15 are agricultural banks.

Between April 8, 1983, and October 1984, seven production credit associations were liquidated. Nine of the twelve Federal intermediate credit banks had to infuse capital into about 10 percent of the 384 production credit associations in the United States.

Mr. President, the tragedy is that while agriculture faces this grave economic crisis, this is occurring through no fault of the farmers themselves. In fact, during this same period of time, the productivity of American agriculture has increased at a rate of 1.75 percent per year. Productivity goes up. Efficiency goes up, and yet the crisis and the web of crises in which farmers find themselves is increasing at an alarming rate.

I reserve time for my colleagues who are also here to speak about this crisis today.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two articles which further amplify the extent of the crisis facing agriculture today. One is by Mr. Hobart Rowan and is entitled "Catch 22 in the Farm Belt," from the Washington Post of Thursday, January 31, 1985; another is a report from the U.S. News & World Report, February 4, 1985, entitled "America's Farmers Down the Tubes?" I ask unanimous consent that these two timely articles be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA'S FARMERS DOWN THE TUBES?

In St. Paul, Minn., some 12,000 farmers and supporters march on the Capitol to protest foreclosures.

In Chicago, 35 farmers are arrested outside the Mercantile Exchange, and 12 more demonstrators are arrested trying to enter the Board of Trade.

In Iowa, 200 angry farmers chant "No sale, no sale" as an auctioneer sells off a neighbor's machinery because he defaulted on a $300,000 bank loan.

In Washington, Senator Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) warns: "I think the specter of widespread violence throughout the Midwest is there."

The tide of worry and anger sweeping across rural America in late January reflected rising concern that thousands of the country's best food producers are in danger of being forced over the brink in the worst agricultural crisis since the 1930s Depression.

Normally conservative and law-abiding, farmers are resorting to desperate tactics to focus attention on their worsening economic plight.

Added to their growing frustration is this tragic irony: American agriculture is burdened by mountains of surplus grain, butter, milk, honey and other products at a time when millions of people are facing famine in Ethiopia and other African nations.

"It's a real shame to be in a situation where we have people starving on one side of the world, and farmers on the other side are going out of business because they can't get a decent price on their produce," says John Woodruff, a state agronomist in Tifton, Ga.

Since 1981, about 20,000 farms have been auctioned off. Thousands of other farmers are simply giving up, forced to sell their land and equipment before they go hopelessly deeper in debt.

"We're losing one American farmer every 2 minutes," declares William Shelton of Danville, Ill.

A recent Agriculture Department survey found that as many as 243,000 of the nation's 2.3 million farms may have serious financial problems, and 145,000 more are in extreme trouble. Many of these debt-laden farmers fear they will be forced out of business this spring because they have exhausted their credit and will be unable to borrow money to plant crops.

As more and more farmers are driven from the land, small towns and cities are dying. Equipment dealers, grain elevators and mom and pop stores along Main Street are closing. Banks that have extended repayments and renegotiated loans to hard-pressed farmers now are threatened themselves.

LIST GROWS

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation's latest problem-bank list included 231 farm banks, more than double their number a year earlier. Since that June 30 report was issued, more than half of all bank failures have involved farm banks.

Almost 30 percent of the federal Farmers Home Administration's 25.2 billion dollars in outstanding loans are delinquent. The problem is most severe in the heart of the nation's bread-basket—Kansas, Iowa, Illinois, Nebraska, Indiana and Ohio.

The crisis had its beginning in the 1970s, when the Soviet Union began buying massive amounts of U.S. grain and predictions of worldwide famine made agriculture a fast-growth industry. Established farmers rushed to expand operations, while about 70,000 young Americans took up the occupations of their parents. Many borrowed heavily to buy land and equipment. Farm debt jumped from 73.3 billion dollars in 1974 to 182 billion in 1981.

The heavy borrowing was backed by rapidly escalating land prices. Between 1974 and 1981, the average price of farmland in the U.S. rose from $302 an acre to $795. Prime Midwestern land shot up to $4,000 an acre.

The boom peaked in 1981, and land values have careened downhill ever since. Economists blame the global recession, a stronger U.S. dollar, years of high interest rates and politically inspired embargoes on food exports that made overseas customers doubt the reliability of American suppliers and provided an opening for competitors.

Net farm income fell from 31 billion dollars in 1981 to an estimated 24 billion, at most, this year. A farm worth $500,000 will earn an average of $10,000 a year—$40,000 less than that amount would draw if put in a bank.

Nationwide, the price of farmland has fallen to about $724 an acre. Prices in Iowa plunged an estimated 20 percent last year alone. Farm debt has barely moved—from a peak of 216.3 billion dollars in 1983 to an estimated 212.1 billion this year. America's farmers now owe more money than Brazil and Mexico put together.

Emanuel Melichar, an economist with the Federal Reserve System, estimates that 83 percent of the farm debt is owed by only 29 percent of farmers. More than two thirds of them have debts equal to 40 percent of the value of their farms—the point at which they owe more in interest than they earn from their crops.

The boom-and-bust cycle has accelerated dramatic changes that already were transforming the nation's farms and rural communities. While politicians still sing the praises of the "family farm," critics say that it now exists only in legend.

Most producers rely on outside income from city jobs or working spouses to keep them in business. A tiny 1 percent of all farmers earn 60 percent of total farm income. Many of them operate like any other big business, relying on ticker tape to keep them abreast of market prices and using computers to tell them how much fertilizer to apply to the fields.

Most of the young operators who mortgaged their land heavily to buy more acreage and add costly equipment already are out of business. Today's central figure is the farmer working 300 to 500 acres—too big to allow the owner to take significant outside work and too small to fully modernize. These midsized operations are the ones most threatened despite the fact that many of them are run by people considered to be good managers.

Typical is Mike Moeller, who farms 500 acres near the central Texas community of Buda. In the last four years, Moeller points out, his only profit was the $15,000, before taxes, that he earned in 1983. His debt now has climbed to $100,000.

What can be done to help Moeller and other farmers like him? No one has any easy answers, but there is growing agreement among farmers, lawmakers, agricultural economists and agribusiness leaders that the nation's farm policy is in serious need of a major overhaul.

The current system is full of contradictions. Some programs bribe farmers to increase production; others get them to reduce output. Some encourage farmers to idle acreage; others prod them to "sod bust" virgin land. There are subsidies that drive up domestic grain prices, and there are export programs that reduce costs for foreign buyers.

The result, critics contend, is to soak American taxpayers a pile of money for farm programs—an estimated 12 billion dollars in the current year—while making U.S. food too expensive to sell abroad. The latter fact was driven home recently when Cargill, Inc., a huge grain-trading firm, attempted to bring Argentine wheat into the United States. Although Cargill relented under intense political pressure, the company argued that it was cheaper to buy abroad, even with shipping costs and import duties, than to buy at home.

Legislators and other officials in farm states are rushing to do what they can to relieve the stress. In Minnesota, the Senate passed a bill that would halt farm-mortgage foreclosures for 120 days. Similar actions are being pressed in Iowa, North Dakota, Nebraska and other farm-belt states.

During the 1984 political campaign, President Reagan ordered a farm-relief program that offers loan guarantees and delays repayments, but critics complain that the money it made available is not sufficient and is not being released fast enough.

The real answer rests with what sort of farm bill the President and Congress will produce to replace the current one, which is to expire next September. The four-year plan that emerges could set national farm policy for the rest of the decade and perhaps for the rest of this century.

Agriculture Secretary John Block promises a program that will bring "revolutionary" changes while saving taxpayers more than 6 billion dollars over the next three years. The objective: Create a safety net of support that would be based on prices in the free market instead of guaranteeing farmers specific prices set by Congress. Farmers would be required to repay government crop loans in cash instead of having the option to pay in commodities. Ceilings would be placed on direct income payments to individual operators. By the end of the 1980s, all such payments would be phased out.

FEARFUL MOOD

Many farmers and rural lawmakers are unhappy over the prospect of dismantling programs that have underpinned the farm economy since the New Deal of the '30s. Major cuts in subsidies, they warn, would jerk the rug from under thousands already struggling to stay in business.

Jim Hightower, Texas agriculture commissioner, calls Block's plan "such an ugly anti-farm proposal that it will wrinkle your shirt just to read it."

"Secretary Block is talking about a five-year transition period," says Billy Griggs of Unadilla, Ga., who grows cotton and peanuts. "But I don't know too many of us who can survive the five years."

Adds Representative Charlie Rose (D-N.C.): "If you're concerned about the family farm, if you're concerned about why the little stores and houses are leaving John Block's boyhood town and want to do something about it . . . then you take a more human-needs-oriented approach."

Numbers of farmers agree there is a necessity to expand exports and reduce subsidies, but they argue that now is not the time to do it.

Mark Cobler, a grain-and-livestock farmer in Ottumwa, Iowa, says the immediate need is to help farmers survive the current crisis. He adds: "On down the road, we need some changes because agriculture is changing."

Even though the Reagan administration's plan would lower the cost to government, and thus to taxpayers, many urban residents and spokesmen may be apprehensive about tampering with a farm program under which the share of after-tax income spent on food has dropped from 25.2 percent in 1933 to an estimated 17 percent last year.

Yet Leo Hopper, an Oklahoma farmer and rancher, notes: "We go to any length to preserve an old building or an endangered animal. But if the new farm bill doesn't help, we are going to see a breed of people disappear."

CATCH-22 IN THE FARM BELT

After 110 years of doing business in the farm heartland of America, the Steele State Bank in Cherokee, Iowa, closed its doors on Jan. 25. This little bank had withstood the ravages of the Great Depression—but it wasn't able to cope with a major agriculture crisis sweeping through the central farm states.

It's just one of a score of rural banks that have gone belly-up since mid-1984. More banks and credit associations are sure to close their doors as thousands of farmers who can't repay current debts are forced out of business. The situation is most acute in the Midwest, but it is spreading to California and other farm states.

Sky-high interest rates (bank lending rates have come down elsewhere, but not in farm country), low prices for crops, the impact on exports of the overvalued dollar and staggering losses in the value of their land and equipment are pushing farmers into bankruptcy and ruin.

In a telephone interview from Kansas City, Marvin Duncan, economist and vice president of the Federal Reserve Bank, said that farm liquidations and partial liquidations in the last half of 1984 were running at "three times the rate" bankers consider normal.

Because land values are plunging—farm acreage in the Midwest can be bought at a 40 percent discount from peaks hit in 1981—more and more farmers have worsening debt-asset ratios. A survey just conducted by the American Farm Journal shows that 21 percent of farmers in the central states have debts that have grown to the dangerous level of 70 percent or more of their assets. That is double the percentage in such dire straits less than a year ago.

John Marten, staff economist for the Farm Journal, said in an interview: "When the debt-asset ratio passes 70 percent, with the returns being what they are, cash flow is negative and the deterioration is substantial. That calls for radical surgery."

Iowa State University economist Neil Harl and other farm experts, along with farm-district politicians and lobbyists, have been begging the Reagan administration and Congress to pay heed by starting some sort of expanded loan-guarantee program. "There is genuine economic fear, and growing anger," Harl told me.

The situation is somewhat analogous to the excessive debt piled up by Third World nations that were fed loans by banks counting on a payoff from ever-inflated prices. Duncan warns that a shakeout is now inevitable "because the hard reality is that some kinds of agriculture production in this country [such as wheat] are in danger of being priced out of world markets."

Nonetheless, as in the Third World, there is an immediate problem that needs to be dealt with, for the sake of compassion as well as to minimize the ripple effect of an agricultural crisis through the rest of the economy. by Duncan's own assessment, unless there is dramatic "intervention" by the government in the next 90-120 days—before spring plantings are completed—farmer bankruptcies will pile up. the casualty list could be 10 to 15 percent of the farm population in some states.

Harl urges a system of federal and state help based on a lien against farmland, with the expectation that the public would share in any profits on future land value. (This would compare to the public's bailout of Chrysler, which returned a profit to the federal government.) "By themselves," says Harl, "farmers can't make their payments, and the lenders can't afford to wait. I'm an economist, and I believe in the market economy too. But there comes a time when government must intervene to avoid massive economic wreckage."

Even though the bank prime rate has plunged nationally from 13 percent to 10.5 percent, the rates that farmers must pay as they try to borrow money to finance new crops run from 13 to 14 percent. "The critical thing is interest rates—we need relief," said Marten.

The problem, of course, is a classic Catch-22: as farm debt soars and the value of farmer assets declines, more farmers careen toward bankruptcy and become a bad risk for banks, already overcommitted in their agricultural loans.

So far, the Reagan administration—to the consternation of Republicans who will have to run for reelection in 1986—has paid little attention. It is concentrating instead on the need to make budget savings by cutting back farm-support programs.

"Given what is happening in rural America, the administration's timing is abominable," according to one of those who will be up for reelection next year, Sen. Mark Andrews (R-S.D.). "This isn't the year to begin tampering with agriculture's safety net."

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I yield to my distinguished colleague from the State of Nebraska, Senator EXON, who has been so active in trying to call the attention of the American people to the crisis facing agriculture and has also been one of those in the Congress who has for the past several years led in the effort to make constructive suggestions for the solutions of problems that are faced by the agricultural sector.

I yield at this time to the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I thank very much my friend and colleague from Oklahoma, whom I have had the privilege of working with in various capacities over a considerable period of time, including the matter of agriculture, which is tremendously important to our two States.

Mr. President, I am pleased to rise and join my friend and colleague, Senator DAVID BOREN of Oklahoma and others in our continuing effort to bring the plight of American agriculture before the President, Congress, and the American people.

Agriculture is the engine that drives the economic well-being of my State of Nebraska and it is in deep, serious trouble.

It has been in trouble for a long time, but those of us who have been saying it is in trouble have been cast aside, and it has not been considered. I remember well on the floor last spring when there were 18 of us, I believe, who stood up in opposition to the administration's proposal to reduce the target price of corn, feed grains, and wheat. I remember well the amendment that I offered sometime in midsummer of last year to restore those target prices back to the commitment that we made to the American farmer in the 1981 farm bill. Above everything else, what the farmers need is when a commitment is made to have that commitment kept because you cannot plan farm production unless you know what the rules are, and we expect them to be followed until they are changed in a proper order of things as with the new farm bill.

Above everything else, we should recognize that the main problem in agriculture today is that we have too low a price for the product of the American food producer—price, price, and improved price is the main thing that we have to have.

As important as restructuring of loans, reduction of interest rates, more help from the Farmers Home Administration when they are giving very little right now, some kind of a plan for acreage control—as important as all of these things are—unless we can get the price up in the future for the products of the American farmer, there is no way that he is going to survive, and there is no way that he is going to be able to pay back the heavily structured debt that has forced many of them into bankruptcy, and all too many are right on the verge of that today.

We have a two-pronged problem that we have to deal with: No. 1, the short-term problem which is now down to a matter of 40 or 60 days at most, and that simply is to provide some loans so that they can get their crops in the ground in many places in the great bread basket of America. People say why is that? The reason for that is in Nebraska, as well as in other States, there have been eight agricultural banks go out of business, forced out of business in the last 9 months in Nebraska.

In many instances there is just no longer any credit available, and, under this administration, the Farmers Home Administration, which traditionally has been the lender of last resort, is not a lender at all. In fact, the word that seems to be coming out of the Nation's Capital today out of the Department of Agriculture is, make all the loans you want, just do not put out any money.

We hear much about the economic recovery which is taking place in America today. The general economic indicators are up and things sound rosy for most Americans. We have heard it for months. Yet there is one segment of the Nation's economy which is suffering from a real depression—our segment—agriculture. "Depression" is not too strong a word.

We have been hit by what I call the triple whammy—low commodity prices, high interest rates, and declining land values. To the best of my recollection, these three terrible troubles have not hit agriculture since the Great Depression one-half century ago. In the intervening 50 years, one or two of these factors have hit at various times, but not all three at once.

Low commodity prices have hit hard. Farmers and ranchers are not getting a fair return for their investment and work. We have been let down by the failure to live up to the promises made in the 1981 farm bill with respect to target prices. The administration even succeeded in lowering target prices last year over the violent objections of those of us who do our best to work for agriculture and the family sized farm and ranch.

High interest rates have hit hard. Our staggering Federal budget deficits keep interest rates abnormally high, choking off investments and making it exceedingly difficult for farmers and ranchers to borrow the money they need to operate. High deficits and interest rates choke off exports as well, causing American agricultural products to be way overpriced in world markets.

Declining land values have hit hard. Nebraska farmland has been devalued by an average of 25 percent over the last 3 years. With declining equity amidst these other difficulties, no wonder agricultural bankers are more reluctant than ever to lend money.

So American agriculture sticks out like a sore thumb in the middle of America's economic recovery. If you do not believe it, go to Verdigre, NE. That is a town where we have had to organize food banks for farmers. That revelation tells the story. It is a story of human tragedy, lost dreams, and suffering. And it is widespread throughout Nebraska and the Midwest—not just isolated pockets of trouble.

This is the problem as I see it. We have a true depression in agriculture. What are we going to do to resolve this situation? That is a question we must ask ourselves.

First, we must ensure that the rest of the country and the political power brokers understand the situation. One or two spots on the network evening newscast is not enough. We have to cry out loud enough to be heard and taken seriously. It should be obvious by now that the administration is not going to do anything for farmers and ranchers unless American agriculture unites and we make ourselves heard.

There is a big difference between the Great Depression of the 1930's and the agricultural depression of the 1980's—something was done in the 1930's. There has been lots of talk, but very little concrete action. This has got to stop. We need action and we need it now.

Second, I have called upon the President of the United States to address the agricultural crisis directly in his State of the Union Message tomorrow night. Last year, agriculture was not even mentioned when the President discussed the State of our Nation as called for in our Constitution. Let us hear what he thinks and what he, as the reelected leader of our country, has to say on this issue of paramount importance to Nebraska and the Midwest.

Third, with the simple stroke of his pen, President Reagan could increase commodity loan prices and provide farmers with a more equitable and meaningful income for their labor. The President should raise these loan rates for corn, as well as other grains, by a minimum of 25 cents per bushel in two phases—an immediate 12-cent increase followed by a 13-cent increase by September 1 of next year, certainly no later than that date. I am talking about shoring up the price of the 1985 crops.

Such a one-time boost in prices will clear the way for many solid farmers to make it through this very difficult period where they simply cannot generate cash flow if they have any leverage whatsoever with $2.50 corn that is projected to go down to $2.20 a bushel, or less, and if the administration's new nonfarm policy is put into effect.

Fourth, we need an immediate expansion of farm credit. While the administration talks endlessly of moving toward a so-called free market over the next few years, our farmers are moving toward planting season in just a few short weeks. They need credit and they need it now.

Those of us who have long been fighting for agriculture finally got the administration to "budge" a little last week when OMB Director David Stockman and Agriculture Secretary John Block announced modifications to the President's credit plan of last September. But those steps do not go far enough and we must do much, much more.

Senator BOREN and I have already announced our intention to force this action. We are working on a major farm credit bill, which will be introduced very soon. Emergency legislation of this type is absolutely necessary and cannot wait. We have already told the majority leader that we will take whatever steps are necessary to delay consideration of all other matters on the Senate floor until action is taken on an effective farm credit package. The outlines of our proposal have already been released, so I will not take time to go over its main points this afternoon.

Suffice to say, Mr. President, that the agriculture economy is facing an imminent collapse which has already begun to threaten our entire economy.

This Senator from Nebraska is going to keep sounding the alarm on behalf of American agriculture. I am going to join with as many others that we can enlist to stand up for our farmers and our ranchers. I am pleased to say that yesterday and again today my good friend and colleague, Senator CARL LEVIN, from the generally considered industrial State of Michigan, has volunteered to begin to put together a coalition of so-called industrial States, who also have agriculture, to come to the aid of the family-size farmer in deep trouble today.

So I am going to keep trying to build a coalition to put back together once again the so-called farm coalition that once controlled, without question, all farm legislation on this floor.

As it has been clearly spelled out by the Director of Management and Budget in his famous article in Atlantic Monthly, this administration went about a detailed program, and they succeeded in splitting us under that farm bill by making different deals with different groups. We are going to try and bring this group back together.

I do not accept the argument that the problem that we have today is just part of some so-called long overdue shakeout in the farm economy that should be allowed to roll over good farmers and ranchers. We will stand and we will fight, and we will do it here and now.

There are pages upon pages of criticism of certain officials, but hardly a word is said about the President's role or his responsibility. Rural America is being devastated by the policies of one man, the President of the United States, Ronald Reagan. It is clear he either does not know or does not care. There is no other explanation. And in either event, it is a sad state of affairs that cries out for correction by the Congress.

Mr. President, it is time for action, not just talk. We will keep up the pressure until the job is done.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleagues to express my deepest concern with the current economic conditions on the farms in rural Alabama as well as other food- and fiber-producing States scattered across this great land.

I should first like to commend the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] for taking the leadership on this issue and bringing the plight of the American farmer to the attention of the American people through the forum of the U.S. Senate.

Other Senators who have or will join us today in this forum should also be commended on their recent actions to have the public eye focus on the current farm crisis. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] and the Senators from Nebraska [Mr. EXON and Mr. ZORINSKY] just last week scheduled a public meeting to initiate the dialog on the growing farm credit problem.

Mr. President, I have known for some time now that all is not well on the American farms and ranches. I have joined my colleagues in an attempt to educate the OMB Director, the Secretary of Agriculture, and other members of this administration on this issue. It appears that just last week they opened their eyes and realized that the farmers in this country are in a financial strait.

We all know the reasons—persistently low farm income, strong dollar, weak export demand, high interest rates, droughts, and declining farmland values. Many agricultural economists and bankers call this period as the worse time on American farms since the Great Depression. In the face of this economic disaster, American agriculture has steadily increased productivity at a rate of 1.75 percent annually. Such a rate generally brings economic enhancement. However, this innovation and hard work is adding to problems of the farmer.

These problems are not just limited to the farm families. There are growing problems in the banking industry and the entire economy. Until last summer, bank failures did not reflect this declining quality of farm loans. But of the 27 commercial banks that failed from June until September last year, 10 were agricultural banks. These are banks that have farm loans equal to 25 percent or more of total loans.

Mr. President, there is a farm credit crisis in this country. The White House said last week, "We view it as a significant serious economic situation that needs to be focused on." But the President is not considering any new approaches beyond the debt restructuring he announced last fall. I realize that David Stockman and Secretary Block have since that time proposed a new credit program. But the sad part of this situation is the fact that the Farmers Home Administration had $630 million available in Federal Loan guarantees since the President's four-point program was announced last fall and had done almost nothing to implement it. Since that time only $25 million has actually been used.

Mr. President, I repeat, there is a farm credit crisis in this country. It must be addressed. Credit must be made available to the farmers of this country and it must be available before planting time.

The administration must understand that we are not just discussing the concept of a man with overalls living on 40 acres and farming with a mule. My colleagues and I are expressing our concern with one of the most capital intensive industries in our economy. The farm debt of this Nation stands at $215 billion.

Almost every Member of this institution, and the administration, will tell you that something must be done about the budget deficit. But when the farm debt held by 3 percent or less of our population of this country is equal to the annual deficit of the United States of America, it is difficult to get the leadership of the Nation to even recognize the problem.

Again, Mr. President, there is a farm credit crisis in this country. It must be addressed now.

THE MODIFIED DEBT RECOVERY PROGRAM FOR AMERICAN AGRICULTURE

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I wish to commend the Senator from Oklahoma, Senator BOREN, for starting the vigil for the farm credit crisis that involves us all here in America now.

Mr. President, I am addressing my remarks to the modified debt recovery program for American agriculture. Farmers and ranchers in Montana, along with the rest of agriculture, have found the prices they have received were lower in 1984 than they were in 1980. The last 2 years have been the worst 2 years of net farming income since the 1930's.

As a result of that, many farmers and ranchers who have suffered losses in the past few years have now seen their debt-to-asset ratio increase to the point that their credit may be shut off. Three production credit associations have closed their doors in Montana since the first of the year. Five more have been liquidated in the Northwest since August 1983. American agriculture needs better prices that exceed the cost of production, so there is income to pay their bills and to stay in business. To survive, many operators will need credit with lower interest rates and a stretched-out time for repayment.

The key is affordable credit. That is why I am for the modified debt recovery program. This modifies an agricultural loan with a private bank or PCA with an interest rate of about 10.5 percent. Further, under certain circumstances, an interest rate as low as 7.25 percent could be worked out under the Farmers Home Administration Operating Loan Program, with the bank or PCA lender handling all of the forms and paperwork.

It is very important under the modified debt recovery program that the expertise of private lenders be used to avoid the bottleneck of the Farmers Home Administration offices that are bogged down with too many loans and too much paperwork. The use of guaranteed Farmers Home Administration loans that back up the debts of the individual farm borrowers is essential to provide the individual farmer or rancher with the capital needs he must have to stay in business at an interest rate his cash flow could, in fact, pay back. But I stress the loans are still handled by the banks and the production credit associations.

The Modified Debt Recovery Program was supported at a public hearing we held here in Washington on January 30. At that meeting, individual farmers and ranchers, farm groups, their leaders, and farm credit system officials all testified to the urgency of this crisis. Many of these same spokesmen endorsed the Modified Debt Recovery Program. This is a concrete step that we can take immediately and does not need new legislation. We cannot afford to wait. Some of us have written the President and urged him to take all the necessary administrative steps as quickly as possible.

This is the first step to shore up American agricultural credit and to do it immediately. After that, we can discuss at length the farm programs and the expansion of trade and the broader use of American agriculture products that will shore up and improve the prices our producers receive for their products.

A CRISIS IN FARM POLICY

Mr. President, American farmers have efficiently produced huge quantities of food commodities to provide plenty for U.S. consumers, almost all of the emergency food provided for starving African countries and an adequate surplus to meet next year's foreign commitments, plus meeting the projected 18 to 24 months of African emergency needs. Most of the world marvels at American farm production. It is a great success for the United States, and sharing food abundance is a noteworthy policy.

But Secretary of Agriculture Block and President Reagan are calling for steps to discourage farm production and decimate farm credit to decrease the number of farmers, all in the belief that less food production will be beneficial. As part of that plan they have tightened eligibility for the Farmers Home emergency loans. This is at the very time farmers need the credit most and the starving in Africa most need American food.

In ancient Egypt, Joseph and the Pharaoh conceived the need of saving food for years of drought. Today, just south of there, we witness the 20th century drought of the Sahel, which has caused starvation for millions, but is gradually being alleviated from food stored during years of American abundance. Under the leadership of private charitable U.S. food aid organizations, food is being distributed, almost all of it produced on American farms and donated by the U.S. Government.

Although the food produced in the United States is saving lives in Africa, many American farmers are desperately trying to save themselves from an increasingly stark economic crisis. Several years of tough times with low farm prices and high interest rates have culminated in the lowest 2 years of net farm income since the 1930's. The immediate crisis is insufficient income for many farmers to pay the interest on their loans and their operating bills. Altogether, the 2 million American farmers have total debts of $216 billion, and their lack of net income is compounded by declining land values, rapidly declining values for farm machinery, and other agricultural assets as well.

The asset side of their ledger is deteriorating so rapidly as to cause an increasing number of farm liquidations, accompanied by failures of their banks, of production credit associations that have provided operating loans. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has placed 231 farm banks on their "problem bank list," double a year earlier.

For those farmers whose debt-to-asset ratio is so bad that banks cannot loan them money, the Department of Agriculture has emergency loans available. But last fall President Reagan, before the election, announced that the loans were available but did not reveal the strings attached to the loans that make it impossible for farmers to qualify. As a result, of the $4.3 billion appropriated by Congress last fall for Farmers Home loans, over $3.3 billion remains in the Department of Agriculture till.

To increase American farm crop sales abroad, Secretary Block and President Reagan propose to lower U.S. farm prices even more. Food costs U.S. consumers only 16 percent of disposable income, lower than anywhere else in the world. So whatever Federal farm programs cost, consumers have obviously reaped benefits in low food costs. In addition, abundant food supplies have provided minimum nutritional needs for the impoverished through domesic food assistance programs.

Although American farmers' efficiency exceeds all others throughout the world, sufficient open markets are not available to clear supplies. Most other countries severely restrict agricultural imports and subsidize their own exports to lower the price and attract buyers. U.S. policy, on the other hand, accepts most food imports and avoids subsidies for our food exports.

For corn, wheat, cotton, rice, and milk, the U.S. Government provides a basic price at which the Government is willing to purchase the commodities from the farmer and keep them in Federal storage until the market price is higher or the food is used for emergency relief. The United States produces these commodities in such quantities that U.S. support prices become the world price in times of surplus.

A current example is the U.S. support price for wheat, which is $3.30 per bushel. And that establishes the world price. At that price, a pound of wheat costs less than 7 cents, providing almost a whole day's nutrition of 10 to 15 percent protein and approximately 1,500 calories. A pound of dried powdered milk costs the Government 91 cents, has 1,600 calories, excellent nutrition, and when reconstituted is 1⅓ gallons of milk.

As inexpensive as American-produced commodities are, and despite the loss of net farm income that threatens to drag under almost 20 percent of U.S. farmers, Secretary Block advocates legislation to lower U.S. support prices to make U.S. producers more market oriented. In short, the administration argues that we can sell more if we sell cheaper but defines an orderly transition as lower production with a fewer number of U.S. farmers.

If the plan contrived by Secretary Block and the President is adopted, it could achieve lower farm production by bankrupting farmers, or it could result in a severe shortage of food supplies if demand were much greater than anticipated or drought drastically lowered anticipated production.

The administration's proposals are neither wise nor necessary. There are probably no supporters in the banking and agribusiness community, which have in recent months become greatly alarmed at dwindling farm income and assets. Secretary Block's scheme has no takers among farmers or farm organizations.

American agricultural production is a strength that should be maintained. Humanitarian food relief is good U.S. policy, and building toward more world trade with barter or reduced prices for sales to hard-pressed countries is good business.

Forcing more farm insolvency through lower farm income should not be viewed as at all acceptable. From the humanitarian view, it is cruel, because millions are surviving only because of our surplus production.

Farmers need two honest policies: A better price and available credit spread over a longer time at lower interest rates. Hungry people here and abroad need U.S. farmers with stable production.

Secretary Block is right about one thing—all of us want farmers' income from the market, not from the U.S. Treasury. His problem is that his proposals never get us there; he and President Reagan have spent more on farm program failures than any other administration. A good farm bill can be drafted that leads us there without drawing down on the Treasury as much as he has and without draining from the land the large number of farmers his policies are wringing out of business.

Doing the right thing for both farmers and the starving happens to coincide with the soundest U.S. policy. Save the farmers to save the people.

NORTH DAKOTA'S FARM ECONOMY

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, I want to take a few minutes today to point out that the North Dakota farm economy resembles the other States we are hearing about today.

Recently, the North Dakota Department of Agriculture released a survey it has been conducting of farm economic conditions. The question in that survey asked, "Given the present conditions and trends, how long do you think you will be able to continue farming?" Thirteen and one-tenth percent of the farmers surveyed said 1 year or less. Translated into the total number of farms in our State, that would mean the loss of about 4,700 farm units in our State. That is more farms in 1 year than North Dakota lost between 1978 and the 1982 Census of Agriculture when our farm numbers dropped from 40,357 to 36,436. The projection had been that we would be down to 33,000 farm units by 1995. This survey indicates that we will go past that trend line this coming year.

Yet, these survey results are not that surprising. Last summer, in a research bimonthly bulletin published by the Agricultural Experiment Station of North Dakota State University [NDSU], it was estimated that 28 percent of the indebted farmers in our State, a total of approximately 7,000 farmers were in, what the agricultural economists termed, "moderate to severe financial difficulty."

While the survey is a judgment call by respondents, it is noteworthy to point out that those who felt they had 1 year or less left in farming had an average debt-to-asset ratio of 60 percent. According to the NDSU research publication, and most lending agencies, farmers with a debt/asset ratio of more than 40 percent are in a cash-flow problem and are simultaneously experiencing a significant loss of equity capital.

Significantly, the North Dakota Department of Agriculture's survey revealed that 42.5 percent believe that, based on present trends, they would only be able to continue farming for 2 to 5 years. The judgment of these farmers is fairly accurately reflected in the fact that they averaged a debt-to-asset ratio of 42 percent.

When the figures are combined, farmers who believe they have less than 5 years left to farm total 55.6 percent. This statistic underlines the importance and urgency of both new farm credit initiatives by the Federal Government and the price and income issues of the 1985 farm bill.

The study shows that 37.5 percent of North Dakota farmers surveyed had debt-to-asset ratios of 40 percent or more. This corresponds closely to Federal Reserve statistics this past year which estimated that 31 percent of the farms with gross annual sales between $40,000 and $200,000 are carrying debt-to-asset ratios above 40 percent, and of that group, one-third have debt-to-asset ratios above 70 percent. (Realized gross income per farm in North Dakota averaged $83,146 in 1982 and $95,932 in 1983.)

Dr. Harold Breimyer, of the University of Missouri, reported recently that he believes 25 percent of midwestern farmers are essentially insolvent; that is, if their deflated assets were liquidated, they could not cover their debts. He also stated, "It is worth noting that farmers' individual situations are determined in large measure by the time and terms of their entering farming, and not primarily by their operating efficiency." The North Dakota Department of Agriculture's survey further verifies this observation.

According to the Economic Research Service [ERS] of USDA, total farm debt in North Dakota has increased from a little less than $3.1 billion in 1979 to over $5.4 billion in 1983. At the same time, the debt-to-equity ratio has increased from 19.1 percent to 29.9 percent, while farm income to repay that debt has been declining.

While farm debt has been increasing, the value of farm assets has been decreasing. According to the ERS, average land values in North Dakota dropped from a high of $436 per acre in North Dakota dropped from a high of $436 per acre in 1982 to $414 in 1983. A survey released last week by an agricultural economist at NDSU showed an 8-percent declined in land values this past year, with some counties experiencing up to a 16-percent decline.

Mr. President, for the past 5 years, we have been trying to catch up to the inventors and the regulators in undertaking the first comprehensive restructuring of the banking and finance industries in many, many years. We have heard the concept of the level playing field advanced many times as our guide toward banking and finance legislation. Farm income has to be a part of the level playing field concept in banking.

Unlike much of the 1970's when landowners could often reamortize real estate debt to free equity out of land to supplement current cash flow, this option tended to close as farmland and other capital assets ceased to appreciate and started to decline. Some agricultural lenders and farm operators have been able to substitute debt for cash returns to an unusual extent, but neither party can do business for long on that basis. Farmland appreciation in real terms may remain nil for several more years, and further depreciation will occur if commodity price support loan rates and target prices are dropped.

What that means, Mr. President, is that in addition to bankrupting our farm operators, we are putting our rural bankers in a very tough spot. As we move toward nationwide deposit-taking powers for financial institutions, where is the level playing field if you cut farm income, the major source of deposits for our rural banks? If you cut farm income, and allow the money center financial institutions to compete with our rural banks for what is left, how long and how well can you expect our rural banks to adequately service the commercial lending needs of our farm operators and main street businessmen?

Mr. President, rural commercial banks extend credit to farmers and ranchers primarily for working capital and the financing of equipment and livestock. On January 1, 1983, commercial banks remained the largest supplier of such non-real-estate credit to agriculture, with slightly over 34 percent market share. Commercial banks also held 7.7 percent of real estate farm debt.

Thus far during the 1980's, the primary shift in market share among lenders of non-real-estate farm debt is a substantial increase in direct credit by FmHA and CCC, with corresponding reductions in short- and intermediate-term debt held by commercial banks and PCA's. On January 1, 1983, the FmHA and CCC held an estimated 27.2 percent of total farm debt of this type. However, this shift to USDA credit derives mostly from the serious depression in agriculture.

And now I understand the administration is going to propose ending all direct lending activities by the Farmers Home Administration.

Mr. President, for a variety of reasons, some of which are beyond our control and some of which we do control, we are at a center of history in rural America. Who will control agriculture in the year 2000? Who will own the farmland? Who will control the financing? These are questions in which every citizen in America has a stake.

Bishop Maurice Dingman, past National Catholic Rural Life Conference head, said last week that if we lose the number of farmers over the next couple of years that our studies are predicting, we may soon face a land problem similar to those in Latin American countries.

Mr. President, the problem is that serious.

MICHIGAN'S FARM ECONOMY

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I commend our colleague from Oklahoma for setting aside the Senate's time to focus on the farm crisis currently occurring in rural America. It is a crisis which affects all Americans, wherever we happen to live. Senator BOREN's agricultural vigil has brought the emergency in the farm belt to the attention of the Senate and I hope the country. I also hope it gets the administration's attention; neither the administration nor the country, nor the Senate for that matter, have yet recognized the severity of the problem.

Most people think of Michigan as primarily an industrial State, but it also has a large agricultural industry. Michigan has more farmers than Kansas. The farm population of Nebraska is about identical to that of Michigan. Michigan ranks first in the production of many forms of beans and tart cherries. It ranks third in the production of apples, carrots, celery, mushrooms, prunes, plums, red kidney beans, sweet cherries, and tomatoes for processing. We are major producers of dairy products, soybeans, corn, wheat, and a number of other products. The farm bankruptcies in Michigan have risen dramatically since 1980. The proportion of agricultural loans in Michigan that are at least 90 days past due is one-third higher than the national average and many farmers face foreclosures in the near future if they do not get a decent price for their products this year. Agriculture economists are already projecting lower commodity prices this year.

Farm income is very low. The latest Michigan farm statistics show that total net income per farm in Michigan was $6,900, the lowest since 1976. The farmer's expenses have not declined, however. A tractor which cost $27,000 in 1979 now costs $40,000. Pesticides which cost $64.50 per 5 gallon in 1979 now cost $97.50 per 5 gallon. Telephone and utility costs have also steadily increased.

Michigan farm land values have dropped in the last several years and are expected to fall further in 1985. Michigan farmers are desperately hoping their land values will not drop to the drastic levels of many other States. In addition, U.S. agricultural exports dropped from a peak of about $44 billion in 1981 to about $35 billion in 1983. That has affected all our States.

Mr. President, the statistics I cite give a bleak picture of Michigan agriculture and U.S. agriculture. The outlook in the farm belt, in particular, is even bleaker. These statistics are more than just numbers on a page. They are the faces of a community whose major source of income is drying up. They are the faces of small farmers who have no other source of income. They are the faces of children who cannot plan on staying in the farm community. They are the faces of the farm implement dealer who has no buyers. They are the faces of the fertilizer dealer who cannot afford to extend any more credit to his customers. They are the faces of the young farmer who cannot afford to start his own farm. They are the faces of parents who worry about when the banks will foreclose.

There is a real crisis going on in America's rural community. Although the farmers have tried to get the attention of the rest of the Nation in the past several years, they have been patient. They were patient when the administration proposed cuts in agricultural programs because they were willing to contribute their fair share. They have been patient with Congress which changes the rules of the farm programs every year. They have been patient with the administration that promised them a better loan credit program and then neglected to act. They have been patient with promises of greater exports from an administration that is now proposing to eliminate direct export credit to our trading partners.

But they have lost their patience. The farmers in this country are asking for help. They are picketing the Chicago Board of Trade. They are banding together to prohibit foreclosures. They are organizing groups to lobby their State legislatures. And they are asking their Senators and Representatives for help.

This is a situation which we must all be concerned about whether we represent a predominantly farm State or a predominantly industrial State. What happens to the farm economy directly affects the rest of our economy. Consumers who are accustomed to adequate supplies of food at a stable price will be adversely affected by a dwindling number of farmers. Failure of rural banks which carry high agriculture debts further damages the local economy.

Time and time again when I have asked individuals what should be done about the low prices our farmers are receiving and the credit problems they face, I hear that the farmers in trouble are those that are poor managers and inefficient farmers. How efficient does one have to be to make ends meet on $6,900 a year? Is it due to poor management that farm land prices have fallen? Is it the farmer's poor management that resulted in a drop in agriculture exports?

In the President's background on major spending reforms which accompany his proposed fiscal year 1986 budget, there is a statement that, in my opinion, sums up the attitude of this administration:

> Added Federal credit is not the answer to correct current financial problems within the farm sector. The immediate financial crisis experienced by farm operators will not be addressed by adding to already unmanageable debt burdens. New Federal credit cannot serve as a substitute for income.

In other words, do not look to us for help—we will only add to your problems. Go to the banks or find a way to increase your income. The President's fiscal year 1986 budget is also proposing cuts of $2 billion for commodity programs and farm lending programs.

We all recognize the significance of the Federal deficit and its effect on farmers. As long as deficits remain excessive, high interest rates will continue to plague our international trade and our domestic production. The strong dollar makes our agricultural exports less competitive abroad and high interest rates increase the farmer's operating costs. There is no question that farmers are willing to make sacrifices in order to get the deficit reduced. The question is what is fair and what is effective.

THE FARM CRISIS

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I salute my distinguished friend the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] for his efforts in helping to draw attention to, and hopefully to get some action on, the plight of the American farmer. I share his concerns about the problems facing the American farmer, and I am pleased to stand with him now as I have in the past to point out the need for positive solutions to this worsening problem.

Mr. President, the term "farm crisis" is so overused that it no longer has any emotional impact on some people. We have been hearing about the crisis in agriculture for several years, and I have been talking about that crisis together with the Senator from Oklahoma and other concerned Senators. But the fact that some people in this administration may be tired of hearing about farm problems does not mean that they have gone away.

Instead of going away our farm problems have gotten steadily worse. Net farm income increased in 1984, but most of that came from an increase in inventories. In other words, our surplus just got larger.

What farmers really need is cash income to pay their bills, cash to pay the crushing expenses of today's high interest rates. Farmers' net cash income is forcast to drop for the third year in a row in 1985. This could well mean that farmers' real, after inflation, cash income would be the lowest since 1968. Farmers can't pay 1985 bills with 1968 paychecks.

You do not need a college finance course to know that when you don't have the cash to pay your bills, then you're bankrupt no matter what your balance sheet says. With those cash income figures it is no wonder that farmers are going under in droves. The Kansas City Federal Reserve bank reports that farm liquidations in late 1984 were running three times the normal rate.

Farm balance sheets are eroding fast also. In some areas land prices have dropped by 40 percent or more. Farmers are losing the cushion of land equity that many have been borrowing against, and those farmers that were already borrowed up to the limit have been plunged over the edge.

Mr. President, we have a crisis in farm credit on our hands. Farmers right now are going in to get financing to plant their next crop in most areas of the country. In my home area of south Texas planting season starts in about a week. In many cases that credit is not going to be there.

Let us be honest about why many of those loans will not be made. I have talked to Texas bankers. I know they want to help their farm customers survive. But all too often, they cannot. One banker said quite frankly that if the rumors he was hearing about the Reagan farm bill were true then he would simply liquidate all his farm loans. He pointed out that his farmers were barely making it at current prices, and that he had a fiduciary duty to his depositors and his stockholders that would not allow him to throw away money on loans that could not be repaid.

We have heard a lot about the administration's debt restructuring program. It was announced last September, just before the election. The regulations were not announced until after the election, and I am told by Texas farmers that the program is largely useless.

In fact, in many cases it is actually hurting farmers. Overworked local FmHA offices are having to process applications for loan deferrals on a high-priority basis, taking time that they desperately need for processing their heavy workload of regular loan applications. Almost no one is getting these deferrals, but many regular customers may not get the money to plant because of these delays. One farmer told me that his local FmHA office could not get to his loan application until March because of delays with deferral applications, even though he should plant his sugar beet crop on March 1. He also said the local FmHA office had yet to approve a single deferral.

Yes, we have a farm credit crisis right now, and it looks like it is going to be much worse than those we have experienced in past years. But the real crisis in agriculture is a crisis in prices. Farmers cannot get loans because they can't pay them back.

They can't pay off those loans because interest rates are too high and prices are too low. The prime interest rate has been over 10 percent for 6 years now. Since 1981 the price of wheat has dropped 20 percent, grain sorghum has dropped 25 percent, cotton has dropped 26 percent, and rice has dropped 38 percent.

Some say prices have dropped because of surpluses, and they're right. Why do we have surpluses? We have surpluses because we can't export. Why can't we export? Because our prices are too high.

But wait a minute. That does not sound right. How can our prices be both too low and too high?

The answer is the bloated value of the U.S. dollar. Our domestic economic policies of high interest rates since 1981 have caused the value of the dollar to go up by 63 percent against the Dutch guilder, and Rotterdam is one of the centers of the world grain trade. Our Government's economic policies are pricing our farmers out of their export markets.

Look at how this works. In January 1981, an American farmer could get $5.25 per bushel for his wheat on the dock in Houston. To a Dutch trader in Rotterdam, this was 11.44 guilders. In January 1985 a U.S. farmer could get only $4.11 for his wheat at the dock in Houston. However, to the Dutch trader this was 14.59 guilders. The farmer's price dropped 22 percent, but the export customer's price went up 28 percent.

This is what I mean when I say our farm prices are both too high and too low. They are too low for our producers but, because of the bloated dollar, too high for our foreign customers.

This is a major reason that the volume of U.S. farm exports has dropped for 4 years in a row.

Argentina's agricultural exports are booming, in no small part because the value of their currency against the dollar has fallen by 86 percent in just the last 12 months. Cargill recently made it clear that they could deliver Argentine wheat to Houston, including purchase price, ocean freight, and a 21-cent-per-bushel U.S. tariff, cheaper than Amarillo wheat.

Another major reason we can't export is our trade policy. We are selling out U.S. farmers by forcing them to compete against foreign governments. The European Community, for instance, subsidizes its farmers to increase production, and then it dumps the resulting surplus on the world market. We subsidize our farmers to reduce production, and then we pay to store the surplus when the European Community takes our export market.

Let me give you an example on sugar. Today the European Community pays their farmers 27 cents a pound for sugar. You know what they sell it for on the world market? Five cents.

The European Community pays a tremendous subsidy, and in return it has gotten a tremendous increase in production. Why should it not under those conditions?

The value of an acre of land in France used for sugar beet production has increased from $1,000 to $7,000.

By contrast, every night on the network news we see more U.S. farmers being sold out at auction. We are told that U.S. farm land prices have dropped 40 percent in some areas and they are still falling rapidly.

Mr. President, last Thursday I made a floor speech on our trade problems. I pointed out that although a trade war poses great risks, even greater risks lie in waiting for the rest of the world to adopt a free trade policy out of the goodness of their hearts. It just will not happen.

Likewise, facing up to our farm problems may cost some money at a time when we are trying hard to reduce our deficit, but the cost of not facing those problems may be much higher.

Agriculture is our Nation's biggest industry. Agriculture employs 22 million people, more than any other industry, and generates one in every five jobs. It accounts for 20 percent of our gross national product. Farming alone has as many workers as the transportation, steel, and auto industries combined.

Farmers keep 150,000 auto workers employed just to make the equipment they buy each year. Farmers use 6.5 million tons of steel each year, employing 40,000 steelworkers. They spend $15.4 billion on petroleum products and maintenance.

Each farmer now grows food for 78 other people who are thus free to make other products to raise our standard of living. The U.S. consumer can purchase those other products because he spends only 16 percent of his disposable income on food. The Russians spend 45 percent, and even the British spend 28 percent.

This productivity has been passed through to the American consumer in the form of lower food prices. In 1950 the average worker worked 32.8 minutes to buy a pound of steak, and worked an hour to buy 10 pounds of bread. Today it only takes 18.5 minutes to get the steak and 37.5 minutes to get the bread.

Agriculture has also paid for many of our imports. In 1984 we had an all time record trade deficit of $123.3 billion, but the agriculture sector had a net trade surplus of $19 billion.

Also in 1984, a farmer in west Texas rented a building on the town square of his small town. In better times it had been a store. He tore out the back wall to make a large door, and now he uses it as a barn. You see, it was cheaper to rent the store than to build the new barn he needed. There used to be a small business in that store, run by a local family. Now they and many others are gone. That's happening all over rural America.

Farmers tell me they don't want more credit—they want a fair price for their product. They know they can't borrow their way out of debt. They want to earn their way out of debt.

They know they can compete with farmers anywhere in the world. We have tremendous advantages. We have financial and political stability, excellent land and climate, a trained and efficient work force. But U.S. farmers cannot be expected to compete successfully against foreign government trade barriers and export subsidies. U.S. farmers cannot be expected to hold onto export markets when every President since Nixon has subjected them to an agricultural embargo. U.S. farmers cannot expect to compete in world markets when their own Government's policies are subsidizing their competition by tilting the currency exchange rates.

Let us give our farmers a free market to compete in and let them go. But don't weight them down with a bloated dollar, high interest rates, and foreign trade barriers and then throw them into the world market to sink or swim. They may well sink, and if they sink much of our country's economy sinks with them.

I think our Government's policy should be cushion the shock of our current farm problems, not make it worse. I for one do not intend to abandon this Nation's most important industry, and I hope that this administration will do likewise and come up with some better farm policies than those we have seen and heard rumors about in recent months.

OUTLINING AN EMERGENCY FARM CREDIT ASSISTANCE PROPOSAL

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, Our Nation's farmers are experiencing severe financial stress due to low farm income, high interest rates, and declining farmland values. The Department of Agriculture estimates that about 18 percent—or 430,000 farmers—have debt-to-asset ratios that are dangerously high, in excess of 40 percent.

In addition, farmers have lost an unprecedented amount of equity in their operations during the last 4 years—$200 billion in inflation-adjusted dollars. Further, the rate of return to equity in farm assets has been negative for the past 4 years. Although farmers have traditionally realized a low rate of return on their investment, prior to the Reagan-Stockman-Block years, 1953 was the last time the rate of return to equity was negative.

Senator BOREN has undertaken an important task—to inform the administration and Members of Congress about the crisis in the agricultural economy. Our colleague from Oklahoma is to be commended for conducting his vigil on the farm economy and I intend to do what I can to ensure that adequate assistance will be available for our Nation's farmers.

The long-term solution to farm credit problems is stronger commodity prices and improved farm income. However, immediate action is needed to provide some measure of emergency relief. For that reason, I have developed an emergency credit assistance proposal.

The proposal I am offering is fiscally sound. It does not create any new bureaucracies and the responsibilities associated with making this assistance available will be shared with lenders, Federal and State governments, and farmers.

Using existing discretionary authorities provided by Congress, some elements of my proposal can be implemented immediately. I have sent a letter to the President requesting him to direct the Secretary of Agriculture to begin using those authorities.

The Farmers Home Administration could take immediate action to hire additional personnel on a temporary basis to process and service loans; reduce the interest rate on direct loans; and eliminate unnecessary administrative requirements that have made the Debt Set-Aside Program and the Loan Guarantee Program unworkable.

Further, I have urged the President to appoint a special task force to study agricultural credit problems and make recommendations on what steps can be taken to provide solutions.

The Senate called for the establishment of such a task force on May 2, 1984, when Senate Resolution 287 was approved. Under that proposal, the task force would have completed its work by January 1, 1985. It is unfortunate that we must now address agricultural credit problems without the benefit of the task force's recommendations.

To supplement the administrative actions outlined, I am preparing legislation that I plan to introduce in the immediate future. In addition to requiring the administration to use the discretionary authorities I have mentioned, that legislation would:

Provide additional loan guarantee authority for the Farmers Home Administration;

Authorize the Farmers Home Administration to provide $100 million in matching funds to States that implement a program to buy down the interest rate on loans made by commercial or cooperative lenders;

Authorize transition assistance for certain Farmers Home Administration borrowers to ease the hardship resulting from insolvency;

Provide expanded regulatory authority for the Farm Credit Administration to ensure greater protection of the borrowers and investors of the farm credit system;

Require the Farm Credit Administration to study the feasibility of obtaining insurance type protection for farm credit system borrower stock; and Direct Federal bank regulators to exercise caution and restraint in adversely classifying agricultural loans.

Without the type of credit assistance I have outlined, thousands of farmers will be faced with financial ruin. We must make an effort to assist our Nation's farmers or what is now an agricultural credit crisis will quickly develop into an economic disaster for all of rural America.

I ask unanimous consent that a brief explanation of the emergency credit proposal, the text of the letter to the President, and a background paper on farm credit problems be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE,
NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY,
Washington, DC, February 1, 1985.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am pleased that some high-ranking officials in the administration have acknowledged that there is a farm credit crisis and that the Federal Government has a responsibility to act quickly in addressing the problem. To help ease the severe financial stress in the agricultural economy, I respectfully recommend that you direct the Secretary of Agriculture to take immediate action to provide emergency credit assistance for our Nation's farmers.

Specifically, the Farmers Home Administration should use its authorities under existing law to:

Implement the $650 million operating loan guarantee program as Congress intended by issuing 90 percent guarantees of loans made by commercial or cooperative lenders and eliminating administrative requirements that lenders must write off part of the principal;

Modify the administrative requirement that a borrower must show that he will have 110 percent of the cash flow needed to meet his obligations to qualify for the administration's debt set-aside program;

Reduce the interest rate—to one-half the Treasury's cost of borrowing—on 50 percent of the agency's existing direct loan funds; and Hire temporary personnel on an emergency basis to provide assistance with loan processing and servicing.

Further, I urge you to appoint a Presidential task force to study agricultural credit problems and make recommendations on what steps can be taken to provide long-term solutions. The Senate approved a resolution (Senate Resolution 287) on May 2, 1984, calling for such a task force. Under that proposal, the task force would have completed its work by January 1, 1985. It is unfortunate that we must now address agricultural credit problems without the benefit of the task force's recommendations.

The administrative actions I have outlined would provide some immediate relief. However, I believe additional assistance is needed. Therefore, it is my present intention to introduce legislation that would:

Provide additional loan guarantee authority;

Authorize the Farmers Home Administration to provide $100 million in matching funds to States that implement a program to buy down the interest rate on loans made by commercial or cooperative lenders;

Authorize transition assistance for certain Farmers Home Administration borrowers. The legislation will authorize the agency to release to certain borrowers up to $10,000 (current market value) in assets used as security for a loan. The assistance would be directed to borrowers who have a negative net worth and who are faced with imminent foreclosure or bankruptcy. The Farmers Home Administration would allow such borrowers to keep or liquidate enough assets so that the borrower would have $10,000 in cash or assets with which to assist in a transition out of farming;

Provide expanded regulatory authority for the Farm Credit Administration to ensure greater protection of the borrowers and investors of the Farm Credit System. The legislation would give the Farm Credit Administration many of the same authorities that other banking regulatory agencies have;

Require the Farm Credit Administration to study the feasibility of obtaining insurance type protection for Farm Credit System borrower stock; and Direct Federal bank regulators to exercise caution and restraint in adversely classifying agricultural loans.

Without the type of credit assistance I have outlined, thousands of farmers will be faced with financial ruin. If the administration fails to assist our Nation's farmers, what is now an agricultural credit crisis will quickly develop into an economic disaster for all of rural America.

Sincerely,

EDWARD ZORINSKY.

SENATOR ZORINSKY'S EMERGENCY AGRICULTURAL CREDIT ASSISTANCE PROPOSAL

IMMEDIATE ACTIONS THAT CAN BE TAKEN USING EXISTING AUTHORITIES

1. Additional personnel to process Farmers Home Administration loans. The Farmers Home Administration has authority to hire additional temporary personnel on an emergency basis to provide assistance with loan processing and servicing.

2. Improvements in the Farmers Home Administration direct loan program. The Farmers Home Administration has authority to reduce the interest rate on direct loan funds.

The proposal calls for the rate to be reduced to one-half the Treasury's cost of borrowing on 50 percent of FmHA's existing direct loan funds. Borrowers would use these low-interest FmHA loan funds in conjunction with loans from commercial or cooperative lenders. The blend of commercial or cooperative credit with FmHA credit would effectively reduce the amount of interest a borrower must pay to obtain credit.

3. Improvements in the Farmers Home Administration loan guarantee program. The Farmers Home Administration has the authority to issue 90-percent guarantees and eliminate existing administrative requirements that lenders must write off part of the principal to obtain a loan guarantee. Lenders could voluntarily write off principal or interest if that was necessary to ensure repayment ability.

4. Improvements in the Farmers Home Administration loan deferral program. The Farmers Home Administration has authority to modify an existing regulation that requires a borrower to show that he will have 110 percent of the cash flow needed to meet his obligations to qualify for a loan deferral or the debt set-aside program. The proposal calls for borrowers to show enough cash flow to meet only 100 percent of their obligations.

5. Agricultural credit task force. The President could establish a special task force to study agricultural credit problems and make recommendations on what steps can be taken to provide assistance to farmers. Such a task force was called for in Senate Resolution 287 which was approved on May 2, 1984.

NEW LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITIES

1. Additional Loan Guarantee Authority. The legislation will provide new loan guarantee authority in addition to the $650 million authorized for fiscal year 1985. Loan guarantees result in Federal expenditures only when a borrower—whose loan has been guaranteed up to 90 percent of the principal amount—is unable to meet his obligations. The lender and the Government share in the loss. Historically, the loss rate has been about 5.5 percent on Farmers Home Administration loan guarantees.

2. Transition assistance for certain Farmers Home Administration borrowers. The Farmers Home Administration would be authorized to release to certain borrowers up to $10,000 (current market value) in assets used as security for a FmHA loan. The assistance would be directed to FmHA borrowers who have a negative net worth and who are faced with imminent foreclosure or bankruptcy. FmHA would allow such borrowers to keep or liquidate enough assets so that the borrower would have $10,000 in cash or assets with which to assist in a transition out of farming. The borrower, in consideration for his transition assistance, would convey the remainder of his property to the government or conduct a sale of the property.

The program would save the government the legal fees and administrative problems of going through a foreclosure or bankruptcy proceeding. In addition, the problems of abandonment would be reduced and the government would likely recover more of the principal owed if a farmer had some incentive to conduct the sale himself and maintain the property until it is liquidated and the proceeds applied against his FmHA loan.

3. Expanded regulatory authority for the Farm Credit Administration to ensure greater protection of the borrowers and investors of the Farm Credit System. The Farm Credit Administration (FCA) would be given many of the same authorities that other banking regulatory agencies have. These additional authorities would include power to issue cease and desist orders to stop and activity that (a) is an unsound of unsafe banking practice; (b) violates law or regulations; (c) violates conditions of operation imposed by FCA. FCA would also be given power to sue and be sued, to issue subpoenas, require mergers of Farm Credit System institutions, and to realign the territories of system institutions.

4. Protection of borrower capital. The legislation would require the Farm Credit Administration to study the feasibility of obtaining insurance type protection for Farm Credit System borrower stock.

System borrowers are required to invest capital, in the form of stock, in the system. In the event of financial problems, the stock or "risk capital" might be partially or entirely lost as was the case when several production credit associations began liquidation proceedings during the past year.

5. Federal/State interest buy-down. The Farmers Home Administration would be authorized to provide $100 million in matching funds to States that implement a program to buy down the interest rate on loans made by commercial or cooperative lenders. The interest buy-down would apply to at least the first three years of loans that are secured by real estate and made for the purpose of restructuring a borrower's debts. The Federal interest subsidy would be recaptured when the land is sold or the title is otherwise transferred. The States would also have the option to recapture the interest subsidy.

6. Classification of loans by Federal bank regulators. Federal bank regulators would be directed to exercise caution and restraint in adversely classifying agricultural loans.

FINANCIAL STRESS IN THE FARM ECONOMY

Persistently low farm income (due in part to weak export demand), high interest rates, and declining farmland values have created severe financial stress for many farmers. This is particularly true for highly leveraged operators. As a result of this severe financial stress, about 5 percent—or 125,000—farm operators could be forced out of business for financial reasons during the coming year. In some regions of the country, the failure rate could be higher.

SOME INDICATORS OF FINANCIAL STRESS

About 16,000 Farmers Home Administration farm borrowers have been delinquent for four or more years.

The Farmers Home Administration currently has 2,163 farms in inventory consisting of 629,512 acres. Prior to 1981, the Farmers Home Administration had no more than 231 farms in inventory at any time.

During the past two years, production credit associations had loan losses of about $540 million. That amount nearly equals the total losses sustained during the previous 50 years.

The Farm Credit System had an estimated $4.6 billion in nonperforming loans for the year ended December 31, 1984.

Farmland values have declined by over 25 percent during the last four years. The decline in farmland values is a major reason that farmers have lost $200 billion in equity since 1981.

The rate of return to equity in farm assets has been negative for the past four years. Prior to 1981, the last time farmers experienced a negative rate of return on equity was 1953.

The percentage of agricultural banks (defined as banks with agriculture loans equal to 25 percent or more of total loans) reporting negative earnings for 1983 reached 7 percent, up from 1 percent each year of the last decade.

Of the banks identified by Federal bank regulators as having financial problems, 37 percent are agricultural lenders. However, only 30 percent of the Nation's banks are considered agricultural banks and in 1982 and 1983 they accounted for only 20 percent to 24 percent of the problem banks.

MID-SIZED AND LARGE FARMERS MOST AFFECTED

Based on current returns on investment, most farm operators with debt to asset ratios in excess of 40 percent are experiencing financial stress. About 30 percent of farm operators with sales of at least $100,000 have debt to asset ratios in excess of 40 percent.

Over 10 percent of the farm operators with sales of at least $100,000 have debt to asset ratios in excess of 70 percent. That group of farmers is highly vulnerable and, without a significant improvement in the farm economy, most of them will be forced out of business or find it necessary to liquidate part of their operations during the next two years.

If current economic conditions persist, the adjustments that highly leveraged farm operators will make are likely to have a substantial affect on agricultural lenders and agri-business. For example, about 56 percent of the $215 billion in total farm debt is owed by operators with debt to asset ratios in excess of 40 percent.

FARM CREDIT SYSTEM PROBLEMS

The Farm Credit System is the single largest source of agricultural credit in the world. The System has three components: (1) Federal land banks ($51 billion in loans outstanding); (2) production credit associations ($19 billion in loans outstanding; and (3) banks for cooperatives.

The System obtains its funds without direct Federal assistance from private credit markets through the sale of securities. However, because the System is one of seven financial institutions that has "agency status", the securities issued by the System have certain characteristics that make them attractive for investors.

The special benefits of agency status and the perception that the Federal government would—if necessary—meet the System's obligations, enable the System to obtain funds at very competitive interest rates. Currently, the System's cost of borrowing is only a fraction of a percent above the Treasury's cost of borrowing.

However, in recent years the System has suffered record losses and numerous production credit associations have been forced to consolidate or liquidate their operations. In the northwest alone, eight production credit associations have been liquidated.

The liquidation of a production credit association usually results in the members of that association losing part or all of their "B" stock. That stock is the investment the members of the cooperative make in the association and, as member-owners, that stock is viewed as risk capital.

When losses increase in the System, interest rates must be raised and over time this could place cooperative lenders in a less competitive position. There is concern that this might drive the larger and more credit worthy borrowers out of the System leaving behind only the riskier borrowers.

The Office of Management and Budget is currently considering a proposal to end the benefits of agency status or at least assess a user fee. The result would be higher interest rates for borrowers and that too could affect the ability of the System to compete for borrowers.

Despite its problems, the System appears to be sound and investor confidence remains high. The System currently has $12 billion in capital and, as a whole, has a strong positive cash flow.

THE FEDERAL RESPONSE TO AGRICULTURAL CREDIT PROBLEMS

Historically, the Farmers Home Administration has been the primary source of Federal assistance for farmers with credit problems. Since 1977, the agency has provided over $36 billion in agricultural credit.

However, it appears that the agency, as it is currently structured and staffed, has nearly reached its limit in terms of the assistance it can provide in a responsible manner. At the end of fiscal year 1984, the agency had over $60 billion in outstanding principal, equivalent to about $5.7 million in loans for each employee of the agency.

Despite the volume of credit the agency has provided during the past decade and the assistance currently provided to about 270,000 farm borrowers, FmHA is the source for only about 15 percent of the non-real estate credit and 10 percent of the real estate credit.

When considering the dimensions of existing farm credit problems, the need to assist current Farmers Home Administration borrowers, and the statutory limitations that direct agency assistance to smaller farm operations, it is evident that FmHA is capable of assisting only a relatively small number of the farmers affected by the credit crisis.

This point is clearly made by examining the Administration's much publicized debt adjustment program that was announced several weeks before the election.

STATUS OF THE ADMINISTRATION'S DEBT ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

The administration's debt adjustment program raised the hopes of the estimated 430,000 farmers facing serious credit problems. To date, the number of farmers receiving assistance under that program has been very limited.

The program has two key features (1) an interest free set-aside of part of the principal owed on FmHA farm loans; and (2) a loan guarantee program.

Unofficial estimates from FmHA indicate that as of January 25, 109,319 borrowers had applied for assistance under the debt set-aside program (applications for the program had to be filed within 30 days of the announcement). Of that number, 3,248 borrowers had their applications approved and 9,150 have been rejected.

At the current rate of approval, about 28,000 borrowers will be assisted under the debt set-aside program or about 6.5 percent of the 430,000 farmers experiencing credit problems. In terms of loan guarantees, 457 applications are being reviewed (275 of them from three states) and only 7 loan guarantees have been issued.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the efforts of my esteemed colleagues to raise the level of awareness of the American public to the plight of the farm sector. I can assure any doubters that the problem in rural America is not imaginary, it is real.

We have all heard about, and are very concerned about, the Latin and South American debt crisis. But think for a moment about the size of that debt. Latest estimates put the U.S. portion of problem loans in the $160–$175 billion range.

Agricultural lending has at the current time, $215 billion in outstanding loan commitments. My point is this, the level of agricultural loans is far greater than the loan commitments south of our border, yet it is the foreign loans we have been hearing about.

It is time we take a hard look into our own backyard, and deal with the problems we find out there. Three years of low prices and high interests rates have taken their toll on the American farmer. In my home State of North Dakota, a poll of farmers indicated that 13.7 percent of the farmers questioned did not think that they would be farming for another year.

Congress has an obligation to the citizens of the United States to squarely address this agricultural crisis. We must recognize agriculture for what it truly is—our only renewable strategic resource. Food will win us many more friends and provide more influence than all of the weapons and military assistance we could ever provide. If the United States wants to become the world leader in the eyes of suffering people, we must provide support in the form of foodstuff, not military guidance.

We will not, however, be able to provide food, and strategically position ourselves in the world, if the American farmer is forced out of business. Nowhere on this Earth, has a nation been as abundantly blessed with agricultural production capacity as right here in the United States. We, as a united body, must strive to ensure that we do not waste that blessing.

Of primary importance today is agricultural credit. Farmers are faced with the prospect of not having the available credit to put their crop into the ground. I can think of no quicker mechanism to facilitate the demise of agriculture than failing to provide the means for a farmer to plant the crop.

In North Dakota, fully 15 percent of farmers are without funds to operate this year. As you can see, Mr. President, we do not have the luxury of debating at length on this credit problem. Spring planting is right around the corner. Something must be done, and done quickly.

American agriculture is much too valuable to squander. It will take a bipartisan effort to arrest the decline we all have witnessed in rural America. We have the resources to come to grips with this problem, and come to grips with it we must.

THE CRISIS IN AMERICAN AGRICULTURE

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I want to compliment my good friend from Oklahoma for his tireless efforts in bringing the crisis on our American farmland to the forefront. We, who represent our constituents from these magnificent marble-lined corridors of Capitol Hill, are too often isolated from the bleak realities that hang over our Nation's farms.

However, I make a point of going home nearly every weekend so that I cannot forget, or fail to understand, the pain that farm families in Kentucky, and across the Nation, are feeling today.

I was, at first, shocked at the statements this administration's OMB Director made to a group of my Senate colleagues. Mr. Stockman said that farmers as well as other "special interests were going to be cut off at the knees" by the administration. My shock turned to anger, then my anger was replaced by total disbelief that anyone could consider America's farmers to be just another special interest group.

Agriculture is the very backbone of this Nation. The farmers fed this Nation from its birth, and now they have become important to the economy of the entire free world. Farming is not a special interest that is isolated in a particular segment of the economy or by geographical region. Instead, it cuts across the Nation, woven as a fabric of life in a special breed of men and women—America's farm families.

We now have only a precious 2 percent of the population working as craftsmen of the land. However, they grow an abundance of goods that, when moved through the production chain, results in the largest employment segment of the economy. The agricultural industry employs over 17 million people.

So I ask how this administration can look upon the farm segment as a special interest group, especially when agriculture was able to export $38 billion of goods last year. This industry contributed directly to the favorable balance of trade of $19 billion—in a year when the Nation's trade deficit reached a sad $123 billion. Our farmers fuel the very economy of this Nation. But members of this vital economic sector are suffocating under a tremendous debt load that threatens any future viability.

Most of us, since childhood, have thought of farming as a serene, peaceful and an idyllic way of life. The word farm conjures up images of country roads lined by neat fence rows, and of sprawling yards with quaint houses and barns. But these peaceful images mask what is really happening to our farm families across this great land.

The debt now borne by U.S. farmers totals in excess of $216 billion, a debt that is far beyond the amount owed this country by our neighbors in the Southern Hemisphere. Yet they, and not our farmers, seem to have the sympathy of the press and the public.

Today's total farm debt has grown almost tenfold from the $22.5 billion figure of 1960. Since 1960, the cash-flow required for input items has risen 50 percent, resulting in a shrinking profit margin. Cash expenses in 1960 totaled about 64 percent of cash receipts to over 84 percent today. Because of these factors, about 40 percent of a farmer's cash-flow is financed by credit today, compared to only 17 percent during the 1960's. That does not include financing on the land itself.

Furthermore, no one today looks at the nominal or stated rate of interest pertaining to production. The real rate of interest, the difference between the rate and inflation is the highest in history, choking off our American farmer.

While we still hold images of tranquility in our minds when we ponder the lifestyle of the American farmer, growing statistics shatter this fiction. A recent informal study of farm State banks by the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City shows that 8 to 15 percent of the region's farmers will not receive their crop planting loans this year.

The family farm that has been passed down from generation to generation has been mortgaged to the hilt. Foreclosures are rampant, threatening an entire way of life. The grim facts are reflected in three counties of southwest Iowa where suicides are reported to have increased by 38 percent.

These difficult times for our farm sector are rocking our financial industry as well. Loan losses have more than tripled since 1979 at commercial banks which have more than 25 percent of their lending dedicated to agriculture.

In the farm credit system, five production credit associations have entered liquidation as a result of loan losses in the last 2 years. Nationwide, commercial banks project a loss of $600 million on farm loans for 1984, while the farm credit system estimates loan losses will exceed $300 million.

The administration announced on a campaign tour of Iowa last year that it would allocate $630 million in Farmers Home Administration loan guarantees and deferred loan payments of 5 years.

Because of redtape and a lack of manpower in field offices, this much ballyhooed plan has provided only $3 million in loan guarantees and has granted its deferred payment plan to a only 3,248 farmers.

The average farm nationwide is about 400 acres, whereas in my State of Kentucky it is only 147 acres. There are 101,000 farms in my State, many supporting more than one family. It is not unusual that the father, the patriarch of the family, works alongside the families of his sons and daughters perpetuating a way of life, and teaching his craft to his offspring. The art of farming is learned by doing. It can be refined in our Nation's schools and colleges, but it can only be learned on the farm.

I have refrained from expressing to this body the situation and pressures my Kentucky farmers are experiencing for a reason. The problem facing American agriculture confronts us all. There is no special segment, no special interest group of farmers. Agriculture is a cornerstone of the economic foundation of this Nation; which crosses all boundaries of this great land.

Last week, I wrote President Reagan and urged him not to forget our Nation's farmers in his State of the Union Address. Many were deeply hurt by such an omission last year. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of that letter be entered into the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, February 1, 1985.

President RONALD REAGAN,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As you finalize your State of the Union address, I respectfully urge you to not forget, in those remarks, to mention our nation's farmers.

Many Kentucky farmers expressed to me their disappointment last year when there was not a single mention of agriculture in your State of the Union message. At a time when agriculture in America is at a virtual crossroads, our nation's farmers need you, their President, to give them words of encouragement and hope for tomorrow.

The problems facing agriculture are not regional; they are found in every community, in every state. Real interest rates are at the highest level ever, making it difficult or impossible for many farmers to finance debt repayments out of current income. The percentage of production costs attributable to interest on debts has risen from 7.6 percent in 1970 to nearly 16 percent in 1983. Federal fiscal policies have dramatically strengthened the dollar, making U.S. agricultural exports more expensive. Our ability to compete in the world market has been undermined.

However, the statistic that is most alarming to me is a human one—the rising age of our nation's farmers. The last agricultural census showed that there were 4,200 fewer farmers age 25 and under nationwide than there were four years earlier.

These numbers show that young men and women are deserting the family farms at an alarming rate. A whole way of life, passed down for generations, is being abandoned because of the fear young people have of tying their futures to American agriculture. They are simply unable to seek fulfillment of dreams about a life spent on their farms. Who, Mr. President, will tend our lands tomorrow?

Our nation's farmers desperately need to know that you are aware of the problems which they face, and that your Administration plans, in the 1985 farm bill, to present a roadmap that will take them into tomorrow without the fear of failure which has overtaken them.

Your State of the Union message is the optimal opportunity to encourage these farmers by giving them reason to hope and to believe that you plan to restore farm livelihoods. Finally, Mr. President, farmers need to hear you affirm to the public that agriculture is the cornerstone of this nation's economy, important to the future of both urban and rural Americans.

On behalf of the farmers of Kentucky, I would earnestly appreciate your consideration of this request.

Sincerely,

WENDELL FORD.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my farm State colleagues to call to the Senate's, Congress', and America's attention the crisis facing rural America.

This crisis is not about nuclear war, hazardous wastes, or foreign affairs. Rather, it is a crisis that well could destroy America's heartland. This crisis, an agricultural crisis, could destroy over one-third of this Nation's best and most efficient food producers. Yes, Mr. President, this crisis could sound the death knell for the backbone of our Nation and the Midwest—America's family farmers and ranchers.

But it is not just our farmers and ranchers that we may be losing. This crisis is much more serious than that. We could lose the small businesses on main street, the schools which educate rural children, the health care facilities which provide needed medical services in the sparsely populated regions of our country, and much, much more.

Troubling questions are being asked out in rural America today. Farmers and ranchers are asking, "Is anyone in Washington listening? Do the Reagan administration, Congress, and urban America care?" I am listening, I care, and hope that my urban colleagues are just as attentive, understanding, and supportive of measures which are needed to solve this crisis.

The rural economy is in jeopardy. While the early- and mid-1970's showed overall economic strength, growth, and vitality, the same is not true for the late 1970's and 1980's thus far. Over 800 counties in the United States—one-fourth of all—lost population since 1980. Nonmetropolitan income and employment growth is not keeping pace with metropolitan measures.

Following what many experts have judged the worst recession since the Great Depression, the U.S. economy experienced initially rapid, and now sustainable, growth. Since November 1982 the coincident index of economic indicators has risen better than 18 percent. Between the third quarter of 1982 and the third quarter of 1984, gross national product has climbed almost 20 percent; gross private investment is up 60 percent; and corporate profits increased 72 percent. During the last 2 years almost 2 million jobs have been created and industrial production as of October 1984 is 19 percent greater than in 1982: Production of business equipment is up 19 percent, construction supplies up 27 percent, motor vehicles, and parts up almost 45 percent and even the production of iron and steel has risen 22 percent—as of September 1984. Since 1982, new construction expenditures have increased 37 percent and new private housing starts are up 43 percent. Reagan administration economic policies have set a new standard for economic recoveries.

But things are different down on, and around, the farm. Since the fall of 1982, when the economic recovery began, total farm production expenses have increased $3.1 billion while total farm cash marketing receipts rose but $500 million. According to Department of Agriculture, farm production costs will equal farm cash marketing revenues in 1984. Therefore the Department's net farm income forecast of $31 billion for 1984 is composed of the value of inventory change ($8 billion), nonmoney income—value of home consumption of farm products and imputed rental value of farm dwellings, $13 billion—other cash income—income from custom work, machine hire, and farm recreational activities, $2 billion—and direct Government payments ($8 billion). After a full year of national ecomomic recovery, in 1983, nonfarm proprietor's income increased 21 percent while farm proprietor's income fell by 36.7 percent.

Capital expenditures in agriculture remain virtually unchanged since 1982; agricultural employment has declined by almost 300,000 jobs; prices received by farmers have risen but 3 percent (or fallen 4 percent relative to the GNP deflator); and farm equity has fallen by almost $64 billion. The volume of U.S. agricultural exports has declined for 4 consecutive years. President Reagan has acknowledged the fact on several occasions that this Nation's largest and oldest industry remains in economic recession.

There is, of course, a very strong linkage between agriculture and the rural economy. Not only does the farm sector create activity through the purchase of agricultural inputs, but also through the purchase of goods and services for household consumption. In contrast to the expansionary decade of the 1970's, farms—as businesses and as family units—recently have had to modify their operating budgets to accommodate the stringent financial situation of agriculture. As a consequence, the rural economy by and large has inherited the same misfortune as the agricultural economy in the 1980's.

The facts are there; we are in the midst of the worst agricultural recession since the 1930's, and nobody, including the Department of Agriculture, is predicting when it will end. Since the fall of 1982, when the National economy recovery began:

Employment in agricultural industries has declined by 100,000 jobs;

Per capita personal income for rural residents increased 40 percent less than that of metropolitan residents;

Farm equity—land value—has fallen by $64 billion;

Capital expenditures in agriculture remain virtually unchanged;

The volume of agricultural exports has declined 9 percent;

Total farm production expenses have increased $3.1 billion while total farm cash marketing receipts rose but $500 million.

The Department of Agriculture reports that America's farmers and ranchers will realize no net income from the sale of their products in 1984 because marketing revenues will be completely offset by production expenses. What net income farmers and ranchers realize in 1984 will be in the form of changes in the value of inventories, the value of farm home consumption of farm produced commodities, income from for-hire custom work and Government payments. Perhaps most disheartening, in 1980 less than 4 percent of farm net cash income came from Government payments, but in 1984, over 22 percent of farm net cash income will be in the form of public aid. I contend that this dramatic increase in the dependence of the American farmer on public assistance during the last 4 years may be our greatest economic failure and political embarrassment.

Record amounts from the Federal Treasury have been spent on farm income support, export promotion and credit programs during the last 4 years. But I am sure my colleagues will agree that never has so much done so little. Given budget deficit considerations we have no choice but to develop the vision and the confidence to do better with less. The consequences of continued neglect are grave: An unchecked, draining loss of our farmers—the most productive workers on the face of this Earth—and the making of ghost towns of our rural communities.

Mr. President, I take this opportunity to alert you, Congress and America to a clear and present danger—an America without agriculture. Because of misguided policies we are rapidly yielding this country's largest, and perhaps its last, international comparative advantage. A consequence of such a failure will be a rural America without economic purpose and an America without its heritage. Be warned: The continued failures of our farmers, our rural bankers, our Main Street merchants will leave rural America devastated and the consequences will ripple disastrously throughout the fabric of our national life for generations to come.

Mr. President, we have been down this road before where once-proud U.S. industries such as autos, steel, and textiles, which were once on the cutting edge of global domination are today mere shadows of what they could have been. Rural America and agriculture are exhausted and embattled; we need your help and plead for your patience and understanding. Anything less will dishonor the hard-working, honest people who constitute the backbone of this Nation. It is time for a national commitment to rural America. The national goal of keeping a farm family on its land is no less grand than President John Kennedy's commitment of putting a man on the Moon.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HECHT). Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 3 o'clock p.m. with statements therein limited to 1 minute each.

THE CHARLESTON PUBLIC HOUSING AUTHORITY

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the city of Charleston, SC, enjoys a rich heritage as one of America's first settlements. People travel from around the world to visit this beautiful coastal community, which has been the setting of some of our Nation's most significant events. Since its founding, Charleston—formerly known as Charles Towne—has grown and adapted to the changes of our progressive society. Remarkably, in the midst of these transitions, Charleston has been able to preserve the traditions and architecture of past generations.

Mr. President, many American cities face difficulties with urban renewal, particularly in the area of providing low-income housing for its citizens. I am proud to say that the city of Charleston, in cooperation with the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the Charleston Department of Housing and Urban Development, is succeeding in achieving this challenging objective.

By revitalizing the inner city with housing similar to the design of the surrounding historical structures, the city of Charleston has been able to maintain architectural integrity, while meeting the housing needs of its citizens. For this outstanding accomplishment, Charleston was recognized with the "Presidential Award for Design Excellence" by President Reagan on January 29, 1985.

This is a tremendous honor, and one in which all South Carolinians can take great pride. The city of Charleston sets a fine example for other cities facing similar dilemmas, and I am pleased to congratulate Mayor Joseph P. Riley, Jr., Charleston Housing Authority Executive Director Donald J. Cameron, and all those at the local, State, and Federal levels who made this project a resounding success.

Mr. President, I know my colleagues in the Senate would want to join me in saluting this exemplary cooperative venture, and I ask unanimous consent that the following article from the Charleston News and Courier newspaper and other relevant material, be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Charleston (SC) News and Courier, Jan. 31, 1985]

"CHARLESTON PUBLIC HOUSING PROJECT WINS PRESIDENTIAL DESIGN AWARD"

WASHINGTON.—A Charleston public housing program received a Presidential Award for Design Excellence from President Reagan Wednesday at the White House.

The award was one of 13 given for excellence in the design of projects built with federal money between 1974 and 1984. Six hundred and thirty projects were considered.

The 113 units, designed along the lines of a traditional Charleston "side-house," are "exemplary in their social, architectural and urbanistic goals and set an important precedent for future public housing projects," the awards jury said in its citation.

On hand to accept the award in a White House ceremony were Charleston Mayor Joseph P. Riley Jr., and the executive director of the city's Housing Authority, Donald J. Cameron.

The houses were designed by Edgar B. Gale of Middleton, McMillan Architects of Charleston and Richard B. Bradfield of Bradfield and Associates of Atlanta.

"In all of our redevelopment work on the (city's) East Side, we felt that quality urban design was just as important in a redevelopment area as it was downtown," Riley said after an America Institute of Architects ceremony honoring the award winners.

Cameron said the projects actually cost $1,000 to $2,000 less per unit than if the city had built a traditional public housing project. Construction of the houses began in 1978 and has cost about $3.2 million. The houses were built on 14 vacant lots in six city neighborhoods.

The houses are located on Coming, Cannon, Huger, South, Reid, Amherst, Marion, Nassau, St. Philip and Line streets.

"Never before has a president put his stamp of approval on the design of any public housing project," Cameron said in an interview Tuesday. The program was developed jointly by the Housing Authority, the city and the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Cameron said the houses—called scattered infill public housing—have provided housing for low-income people and helped in neighborhood renewal. Some of the sites had been vacant for many years, he said.

"Over decades, neighbors had seen vacant lots, vacant buildings and no new construction. Neighborhoods were chosen for the scattered infill public housing program to demonstrate to residents the investment in their community was worthwhile," Cameron said.

Riley said Tuesday the program initially was viewed with skepticism by federal officials and some members of the Housing Authority's own board of commissioners.

"It was difficult to convince all of those who needed to be convinced, that scattered site public housing could be built and be successful," Riley said. "It's meaningful that this city, known for its old architecture, is being recognized for its new architecture," Riley said.

Other award winners were the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, for the design and use of its logo; the National Park Service, for designs used in its publications; Franklin Court, the area around the Benjamin Franklin Home in Philadelphia; Historic Preservation Tax Incentives, for encouraging restoration of historic buildings, the Linn Cove Viaduct project on the Blue Ridge Parkway in North Carolina; The Intercity Bridge between Pasco and Kennewick, Wash.; the Department of Transportation for its symbol signs; The Seattle Foot, a prosthetic device; the General Service Administration's Art-In-Architecture program; the Charles River Project in Boston; The Gardens, a housing project in San Mateo, Calif.; and the new Partnership for Restoring American Cities in St. Paul, Minn.

PROGRAM EXERPTS FROM "WINNERS OF THE FIRST PRESIDENTIAL AWARDS FOR DESIGN EXCELLENCE"

INTRODUCTION

The Presidential Design Awards Program is the first government-wide effort to recognize and foster excellence in Federal design efforts. President Reagan stated on establishing the awards that: ". . . what we build, print, or cause to be manufactured for Federal use directly affects every citizen. We must ensure that these vast investments are cost-effective, well-planned, and reflect the standards of excellence which we all expect from our government."

The thirteen winners of the first Presidential Awards for Design Excellence exemplify the standards fo excellence that should be expected from the Federal government. The best design results from careful planning, technical creativity, and sensitivity to human requirements and sensibilities. It is an instrument to better inform organize, assist, and serve. It should reflect our diverse cultural values and the highest standards.

I believe that these winners clearly illustrate what is possible when dedicated designers work with able administrators to produce functional, cost-effective products and public services. Excellence in Federal design requires not only designers of skill and creativity, but administrators and lawmakers who provide mandates and policies to stimulate good design.

The Presidential Design Awards Program was managed by the National Endowment for the Arts as part of its efforts to nurture and recognize design excellence in America. Through its Federal Design Improvement Project, the Endowment's commitment to Federal design excellence is long-standing and includes initiation of such projects as the Federal Design Assemblies, the Federal Architecture Project, the Federal Graphics Improvement Program, and the Excellence Attracts Excellence program with the Office of Personnel Management.

The Presidential Design Awards have special symbolic value. They call attention to design quality at the highest level of government. Through the President, they bring to all of us a sense of what can be.—Frank Hodsoll, Chairman, National Endowment for the Arts.

REPORT OF THE PRESIDENTIAL DESIGN AWARDS JURY

The Presidential Design Awards Program was established in December 1983 to recognize exemplary achievements in Federal design in the fields of architecture, engineering design, graphic design, interior design, landscape architecture, product/industrial design, and urban design and planning. This is the first government-wide design awards program and its Presidential sponsorship places the issue of design excellence at the highest level of government.

Quality in design has been a national cause since the founding of our Republic. In the planning and design of Washington, both George Washington and Thomas Jefferson recognized that the success of the nation was linked to the vision that people had of themselves and the buildings that housed their institutions.

In the twentieth century, this condition continues with the Federal Design Improvement Project administered by the National Endowment for the Arts—an effort strongly supported by four Presidents for over a decade. In 1982, Federal projects in the fields of design and construction amounted to approximately forty billion dollars. Most of these expenditures exert an important influence on design practices in the private sector, either from the scope and volume of everyday products necessary to the operation of government or from specially designed products which have been adapted for civilian or commercial use. Therefore, a Federal mandate for design quality affects the entire environment and contributes to improving the quality of life of the people of this country.

It should be recognized that the benefits of design excellence also have economic implications. The vast majority of advanced industrial nations have national design programs and their business and government leaders have recognized that good design is good business. As part of our effort to improve the nation's competitiveness in world trade, the Federal government's leadership in improving American design standards is both timely and important.

In this context, the jury applauds the Federal government's initiative in establishing the Presidential Design Awards Program. From among 630 submissions, 91 have been selected to receive Federal Design Achievement Awards, 13 of which have been chosen to receive the Presidential Award for Design Excellence.

Projects receiving the Presidential Award range from a simple prosthetic device commissioned by the Veterans Administration to free amputees from the physical and visual implications of their disability to the Department of the Interior's program of tax incentives for historic preservation—a program engendering thousands of private-sector projects that have raised public appreciation of America's architectural heritage.

By far the largest number of entries were submitted under the category of graphic design, ranging from a single postage stamp to a total graphic communications program. Especially noteworthy is the visual communications system developed by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration whose posters, publications, and logotype generally maintain a high standard of design which truly captures the spirit and vitality of the space program.

The jury further wishes to call attention to the importance of the Urban Environmental Design program of the Department of Housing and Urban Development which has provided local governments and the professional design community with opportunities to make our cities more liveable.

On the other end of the spectrum of design, the jury found much to applaud in the Art-in-Architecture program of the General Services Administration which aims to achieve an integration of building and works of art. The jury recommends, however, that greater involvement of artists in early stages of the design process would significantly alter the relationship between buildings, site, landscaping and works of art.

In conclusion, the jury would like to commend the Federal government for its support of quality design and suggests that it expand on its already proven record. In order to do this, programs that stimulate design through incentives, as well as those that create jobs and educational possibilities, should be expanded. This could include criteria for the selection of design professionals from both the public and private sectors, peer evaluation of projects in progress, and recognition of work that exhibits high standards of excellence. Finally, the jury believes that Presidential endorsement of good design, as evidenced by completed projects, would help create a better climate within the Federal government to strive for design excellence resulting in a higher quality of life for all.—I. M. Pei, Jury Chairman.

SCATTERED INFILL PUBLIC HOUSING, CHARLESTON, SC

"The Scattered Infill Public Housing Project is a highly commendable example of a sensitive approach to public housing. An effective planning process created a partnership of the local community, involved the City of Charleston, the U.S. Dept. of Housing and Urban Development and the Charleston Department of Housing and Urban Development. These groups chose a developmental strategy that both increased the supply of housing and provided a stimulus to neighborhood revitalization. Existing open sites were carefully selected for their potential for neighborhood renewal and for their ability to provide the necessary social continuity.

"The choice of a vernacular house type, the Charleston 'side-house,' proved to be appropriate contexturally and climatically. The use of local construction methods, materials, detailing and colors helped aesthetically to integrate the structures into their surroundings. The new dwellings are so skillfully and sensitively designed and sited that they do not resemble public housing. User satisfaction is high: tenants have been integrated into an existing community, thus avoiding the stigma often associated with large-scale public-housing projects.

"The infill approach to public housing is clearly a time-consuming process requiring the utmost commitment from a housing authority. In Charleston attractive livable environments have been created within stringent budgetary and time constraints. These examples are exemplary.

CONGRESS NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR THE DEFICIT

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, as the Congress grapples with ways to reduce the deficit in the days ahead, there is one proposition for budget control which should not be on the agenda. I am speaking of the proposal to grant the President the unprecendented power to veto individual items in congressional appropriation bills—the so-called line-item veto.

Control over Federal spending is one of the most important responsibilities bestowed upon the Congress by the Constitution. The notion behind the line-item veto is that the Congress has acted irresponsibly in carrying out its appropriations duties. A second notion behind this proposition is that the President will act more responsibly in carrying out these duties than the Congress. Both these notions should be rejected.

First, let us look at our track record on appropriations. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table showing appropriations enacted as compared to the President's request over the fiscal year 1980 through 1985 period be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HATFIELD. This table indicates that enacted appropriations over the past 6 years have been under the President's request by slightly less than 1 percent. The mix of money may have differed from that which the President requested, but spending has been held under the overall level requested by the President. This is not evidence of the Congress wielding a "free-wheeling" hand in providing funds for a wide array of Federal programs and activities. It is evidence of responsible appropriations action by the Congress.

Second, Mr. President, I would like to dispose of the notion that the President is necessarily more responsible than the Congress. I would like to call to my colleagues attention an article which appeared in the January 7, 1985, issue on Fortune magazine on this issue. It is entitled "Veto the Line Item Veto", and was written by Norman J. Ornstein, a resident scholar of the American Enterprise Institute. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. Ornstein points out that the line-item veto, if granted, may defeat its intended purpose. His basic premise is that controlling Federal spending is a political problem, not an institutional one. Presidential interests are more costly. Weakening the spending hand of the Congress by strengthening the spending hand of the President will allow these interests to flourish.

I would also urge my colleagues to read a commentary by George F. Will on Mr. Ornstein's article which appeared in the Friday, February 1, 1985, edition of the Washington Post. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, I have stated my opposition to the line-item veto on numerous occasions. I believe it is a simple solution on face, full of inherent dangers. I caution my colleagues. The veto of individual appropriation bill items will not lead to a significant reduction in the deficit. It will not be an effective method of controlling Federal expenditures. Instead, it will provide for the transfer of spending power from the legislative to the executive branch of Government. As Members of the Congress, we will be giving up one of our most important powers—"the power of the purse."

I urge my colleagues to study this issue closely.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VETO THE LINE ITEM VETO

(By Norman J. Ornstein)

The war on federal spending—at least the rhetorical war—will heat up in the coming months as President Reagan renews his call for the line item veto, the power for the President to veto individual appropriations without having to veto an entire bill. Reagan called for a line item veto throughout the 1984 campaign, suggesting that it would be the most effective, most efficient, and least onerous way to deal with federal spending.

The idea sounds simple and sensible, and many conservatives have embraced the concept. After all, Congress frequently engages in "logrolling," adding programs for special interests that simply pad the federal budget. Then it sends the padded appropriations bills to the President, with his only alternatives being to veto the whole bill—both the good and the bad—or to swallow hard and sign it.

But conservatives should look beyond appearances and join others in opposing this idea. Rather than help contain spending, a line item veto would probably do just the opposite—increase government spending.

The problem with the line item veto starts with its basic premise: that the President is more provident than Congress. That may be true with President Ronald Reagan, but it isn't true in general. We have more to worry about from strong Presidents than a strong Congress. When the Founding Fathers allocated powers among the branches of government, they gave the basic power, and final say, over taxing and spending to the branch of government they felt was least likely to overtax or overspend—Congress.

Though you'd never know it from the political discourse of today, the Founding Fathers were basically on target. Over time, any executive-centered political system will almost certainly spend more and enlarge the scope of government more than one with substantial legislative power; witness the fate of our European allies that rely on parliamentary systems with strong executives and weak legislatures. Compared with nearly all of them, the United States is small indeed in the size of government and the level of taxation as a proportion of gross national product.

Through most of American history, Congress has battled parochial interests on the outside that wanted to expand government largess, and has diffused parochial members on the inside who wanted to bring home more bacon to their districts. More often than not, Congress has had to protect the public purse from Presidents pursuing expensive military objectives, wanting to buy more territory, or expanding federal involvement in commercial affairs. Overall, Congress has had great success; up to the 1970s, our national debt was almost entirely rooted in the massive deficits of our major wars. Our 180 years of peacetime budgets were, on average, virtually in balance.

This is not to say that Congress is either noble or penurious. It is not. But Congress is more likely than Presidents to resist the demands of special interests. Our perception so different because we pay so much attention to the pork barrel, the relatively small share of the budget that is directly involved with parochialsim and logrolling.

The fact that pork is so limited is one of the main reasons a line item veto couldn't really curtail government spending. Most spending, as the Office of Management and Budget has pointed out, is not directly in the hands of the appropriations committees. Consider, for example, the $926 billion in the fiscal 1985 budget. Some $188 billion goes for Social Security; $116 billion goes to net interest payments, something a President could not item-veto; $90 billion goes to Medicare and Medicaid, and they must be changed by legislation, not an item veto.

Another $123 billion of spending is mandated by past legislation. Obligations under contracts signed in past years total another $97 billion for defense and $74 billion for domestic programs. We're left with $237 billion—but $175 billion of that is defense. That leaves, in other words, $62 billion in discretionary domestic spending as the prospective target for line item vetoes. That includes the general operating expenses of the federal government—meaning the CIA, the FBI, the national parks, and so on. The President could effectively veto very little of that whether he had the desire to or not.

And few Presidents, including Reagan, really have that desire. Driven by the same political considerations as Congress, Presidents generally support the kinds of programs that clearly stand out as wasteful. Reagan hasn't taken strong action to reduce outlays for subsidized electric power in the West, his strongest political base and the home of his closest supporters. Nor has he been much of a hawk over subsidized federal grazing lands out West or the water projects that Jimmy Carter tried to eliminate.

President Reagan supported the Clinch River breeder reactor. He supported swollen farm subsidies and generous farm loan guarantees. And during the campaign he pledged to protect the benefits not only of present Social Security recipients, but of future recipients as well. These are not the habits of an individual who would wield the item veto mercilessly.

The problem is not President Reagan; it is Presidents in general. Every President wants to make his mark on the country. Some significant part of that mark comes from proposing new programs and allocating resources for them. Part of President Reagan's ambition has been to beef up our defenses, and he has pushed for the dollars to do so. These dollars may be justified, but they are federal spending. Moreover, Reagan has proposed such new deficit enhancers as tuition tax credits, enterprise zones, and a permanent manned space station.

The bottom line is that if you give the President more power, that power is going to be used to advance presidential interests. That means that over the long run the line item veto will likely increase spending. Beyond any doubt, if the line item veto had been available last year when Congress cut 25% from Reagan's proposed outlays on the MX missile, calls would have been made by the White House to recalcitrant legislators suggesting that a favored dam or building would be item-erased if the lawmaker didn't support the MX. We would have paid for all those dams and buildings—and more MXs.

Yes, but what about President Reagan's claim that the item veto exists and has worked well, in 43 states? We have significant evidence that the line item veto, overall, is not terribly effective inside states. As Benjamin Zycher has catalogued in the Wall Street Journal, per capita spending in the seven states lacking item veto authority actually is lower on average than in states with some form of line item veto. Zycher concludes that the data "do not support the conclusion that the item veto power provides an effective constraint on government spending."

Given the history of our country, and the likelihood that future Presidents will be even more aggressive, innovative, and free with the government's money than Ronald Reagan, it is foolhardy for conservatives to propose a wholesale expansion of presidential power at the expense of Congress. For all of us it is important to remember two other points. First, there is no panacea for the hard work necessary to reduce federal spending. We are all special interests, and cutting spending will bring howls of pain from every force in the society.

Second, we must realize that our problem is not institutional but political. A political problem requires political solutions. The best environment for this is two strong and confident institutions. A line item veto, by weakening Congress significantly, would damage the political environment for deficit reduction. Weaken Congress by any means, and it will have less mettle to resist pressure from interests or Presidents. Instead, we ought to devote our attention to changing the political climate. We need to change public attitudes and create a better opportunity for compromise between the President and Congress that will lead to spending restraint. Diversions like the line item veto don't help.

DEFICIT? DON'T BLAME CONGRESS

(By George F. Will)

Someone should silence naughty Norman Ornstein before he spoils the sport of Congress-bashing. He demonstrates that congressional irresponsibility has not been the primary cause of the many deficits that have produced our national debt.

In an essay for the American Enterprise Institute, he notes that the $80 million Revolutionary War debt was cut in half by 1811. The War of 1812 tripled the debt, but it was almost eliminated in the 1830s. It rose as a result of the Mexican War, but then declined until the Civil War produced a $2.6 billion national debt. That caused Congress to centralize spending, resulting in two powerful appropriations committees. In 31 years (1867-1897), there were 27 surpluses. In 13 years revenues exceeded expenditures by more than 25 percent.

The Spanish-American War, combined with the 1896 recession, initiated 20 years with 11 deficits, but in 1916 the national debt was approximately what it had been in 1896. After 127 years the republic's debt was $1.23 billion. But in 1919, modern war, the foremost shaper of the modern world, had increased the debt 20-fold, to $25.8 billion. Then Congress again tightened budget procedures, and the debt again shrank, to $16 billion by 1930.

Depression deficits were almost trivial compared to those of World War II—$211 billion. The national debt as a percentage of GNP was 33 percent on the eve of the Depression, 43 percent in 1940, 128 percent in 1946.

In 1946 Congress cut the number of committees and took other measures to restrain spending. Thanks to that and economic growth, the national debt as a percentage of GNP shrank to 98 percent by 1949, 56 percent by 1961.

But in the next quarter-century there was just one small surplus ($3.2 billion in 1969). From 1960 to 1980 the debt grew from $293 billion to $993 billion. In Reagan's first term it nearly doubled, as did the clamor against Congress and four proposed constitutional amendments (to restrain Congress).

Although Congress has been, in Ornstein's word, an "accomplice" it has been less important as a deficit-maker than presidents, from Lyndon Johnson with a guns-and-butter policy through Reagan's gamble that the stimulative effect of his tax cuts would make them virtually self-financing, eliminating the need for politically hazardous cuts in spending on middle-class programs.

Ornstein acknowledges that Congress has contributed to the deficits by the decline of its institutional tough-mindedness and the rise of "subcommittee government," which has weakened central control of spending through appropriations committees. And Congress has mastered the art of bestowing blessings by tax breaks rather than appropriations.

But Congress has reduced politically profitable discretionary domestic spending by reducing the amount (as a percentage of the budget) and the discretion (adopting formula programs). Congress indexed entitlement programs, thereby stopping the politically advantageous but fiscally irresponsible process of voting ad hoc increases every few years.

In 1982 Congress, dragging a reluctant president, attacked the deficit by raising taxes in an election year. In 1983 it attacked the deficit by initiating an energy-tax increase. In 1984 there again was something like congressional government, with another attempt to reduce the deficit by raising taxes in an election year, with an essentially passive president acquiescing.

Today there are reports that Reagan will go barnstorming to rally support for substantial cuts in middle-class programs. I, for one, will believe it when I see it from the man who, as Ornstein notes, has supported almost all the water projects President Carter tried to kill, has supported swollen farm subsidies and generous farm-loan guarantees, has supported subsidized electric power and grazing fees for his western friends, has pledged to "not stand for" cuts in the biggest sector of big government (Social Security), and wants some new deficit-enlarging programs, such as tuition tax credits. "These," says Ornstein dryly, "are not the habits of a President who would wield the line-item veto pen mercilessly."

The proposed item veto would cover only appropriation bills, and only a small portion of spending is controlled by such bills. In the $925 billion fiscal 1985 budget, there is just $81 billion in non-defense discretionary spending. And Ornstein thinks an item veto might increase spending because presidents would use it as a club. For example, he says, in Reagan's hands the item veto could be used to threaten dams and federal buildings desired by legislators opposed to MX. We would wind up buying the dams and buildings—and the larger number of MXs.

Ornstein, you see, is doubly insufferable. He robs us of two comforts: the image of Congress as a convenient villain, and the hope that constitutional tinkering can be a panacea.

SUPPORT FOR THE AMERICAN CONSERVATION CORPS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join as a cosponsor of S. 27, a bill to establish an American Conservation Corps to provide unemployed young people between the ages of 16 and 24 the opportunity to perform needed conservation work on public lands.

As a cosponsor of similar legislation in both the 97th and 98th Congresses, it's my great hope that we will finally be able to achieve enactment of the measure this year.

S. 27 introduced on January 3, 1985, by Senator MOYNIHAN and others is virtually identical to the legislation passed by the Senate last year and pocket vetoed by President Reagan. The few changes are in response to administration objections raised in the veto message. The bill differs from S. 27 as introduced in 1983 in that the authorization levels have been reduced from $250 million annually for 6 years to $75 million annually for 3 years. Additionally this bill places a cap of 10 percent on administrative costs—the earlier bill had no cap—and revises the funding distribution mix to increase the States' share from 35 percent to 50 percent and reduce the Departments of Agriculture and Interior's shares from 25 percent to 20 percent each.

Mr. President, this legislation addresses two problems—youth unemployment and deterioration of natural resources. Today despite all efforts by Federal, State, and local governments to alleviate the problems of youth unemployment, the rate of unemployment among young Americans between the ages of 16 and 19 was 18.4 percent in the fourth quarter of 1984. For members of a minority group, the rate was a disastrous 41.1 percent. Nearly 1.5 million young people who were actively seeking work during the fourth quarter were unable to find jobs. In California the rate of youth unemployment in the fourth quarter of 1984 was 18.4 percent also, but higher for Hispanics at 20.4 percent and for blacks at 22.9 percent.

Today there are 27 functioning State and local conservation programs—four of which are in California—the California Conservation Corps started under Gov. Ronald Reagan, the San Francisco Conservation Corps, the Martin Conservation Corps, and the East Bay Conservation Corps. These programs are providing meaningful work—erosion control, flood control, trail maintenance, park landscaping, building renovation—for unemployed youths and at the same time improving California's environment.

These and past programs of putting unemployed youths to work preserving our natural resources have proven to be highly successful. The Civilian Conservation Corps employed 3 million young people over its 9 year history and performed conservation work valued at over $1.5 million. The more recent Youth Conservation Corps and Young Adult Conservation Corps performed similar conservation projects on public lands. In California, 15,878 youths participated in the YCC program from 1975 to 1981 when YCC was the undeserving victim of Reagan budget cuts. In its peak year of 1979, the Forest Service provided jobs in California for 1560 YCC enrollees in reforestation, fishery enhancement, campground improvements and other needed projects. This year without YCC moneys jobs were available for only 179 young people to assist with Forest Service conservation projects in California. Yet the need for jobs and conservation work remains.

Mr. President, I want to point out that studies done on the YCC and YACC also show youth conservation programs to be cost effective—returning $1.20 in appraised conservation work for each $1 expended. This figure does not include the benefits realized by putting previously unemployed young people to work.

Mr. President, I recognize there is another current problem—the massive Federal deficit. Although I do not believe that we should bring a halt to all of our efforts to deal with pressing national needs—like jobs and conservation—I am acutely aware of the need to bring down the growing Federal deficit. Thus, it would be my intention to seek reductions in spending in other areas to offset any new funds appropriated for the American Conservation Corps Program. This approach would allow us to continue to address pressing areas of need in a fiscally prudent manner. Clearly, outdated, ineffective or unnecessary programs should be eliminated and those that are too costly or low priority should be trimmed back so that new, needed initiatives can be pursued.

A TRIBUTE TO JOHN HORNE

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on January 8, 1985, America lost an outstanding public servant when John E. Horne passed away.

During his lifetime, Mr. Horne had performed a number of different jobs in public service, and done an excellent job at each.

A native of Clayton, AL, Mr. Horne received a certificate from Alabama's Troy State University prior to earning bachelor's and master's degrees from the University of Alabama. He became a fellow in history at that school in 1935.

After serving in the Navy during World War II, Mr. Horne first came to Washington in 1947 as administrative assistant to Senator John J. Sparkman, who was elected to the Senate that year and would serve with many of my colleagues in this distinguished body before his retirement in 1978.

In 1951, John Horne became head of the Small Defense Plants Administration. Three years later, he was named staff director of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

The 1956 Presidential election found John serving as assistant campaign manager of Adlai E. Stevenson's 1956 Presidential candidacy. This was one of the few ventures in which he did not meet with success.

In 1960, he went on to serve as executive director of the National Citizens Committee for Kennedy and Johnson. After President Kennedy's election, John Horne was named Administrator of the Small Business Administration. In 1963, he was appointed to serve as a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and served as Chairman of that Board from 1965 until 1968. In 1969, he became president of the Investors Mortgage Insurance Co., and would serve as chairman of that firm from 1979 to 1978. At the time of his death, Mr. Horne was president of John E. Horne Associates, a consulting firm he founded in 1979 to deal with housing, small business, and general government matters.

His lifetime of varied pursuits brought Mr. Horne many different honors and activities. In 1981, he was named one of 50 outstanding contributors to better housing by the American National Housing Conference. John was also a governor of the Society of Financial Examiners, a member of Phi Beta Kappa, the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Sons of Confederate Veterans, and numerous other civic and community organizations.

Mr. President, I wish to extend my most sincere personal sympathy to John's wife, Ruth, his daughters, Linda Clark and Susan Ewart, and the remainder of his family.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that articles from the Washington Post and the Washington Times be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORMER HEAD OF SBA JOHN E. HORNE, 76

John E. Horne, 76, a former head of the Small Business Administration and chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, died yesterday at his home in Alexandria after a heart attack.

At his death he was president of John E. Horne Associates, a consulting firm he founded in 1979 to deal with housing, small business and general government matters.

In 1981, Mr. Horne was named one of 50 outstanding contributors to better housing by the American National Housing Conference.

He became president of the Investors Mortgage Insurance Co. in 1969 and, from 1970 to 1978, was chairman of the firm.

Born in Clayton, Ala., Mr. Horne received a certificate from Troy State Universtiy in Alabama in 1928 and his A.B. and M.A. degrees from the University of Alabama. He became a fellow in history at the latter school in 1935.

From 1935 to 1939, he was a representative of the Macmillan Publishing Co., and, from 1939 to 1942, he worked for the Row, Peterson Publishing Co. He came to Washington as administrative assistant to former Sen. John J. Sparkman, D-Ala., in 1947.

In 1951, Mr. Horne became head of the Small Defense Plants Administration and three years later was named staff director of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee in 1954.

Mr. Horne was assistant campaign manager for Adlai E. Stevenson's 1956 presidential candidacy and in 1960 was executive director of the National Citizens Committee for Kennedy and Johnson.

When the Kennedy administration came to power in 1961, Mr. Horne was named administrator of the SBA. In 1963, he was appointed a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and from 1965 to 1968 was chairman of the board.

He next was an official of Investors Mortgage Insurance Co. before founding his own firm.

Mr. Horne was a trustee of the Foundation for Cooperative Housing and a member of the board of directors of the National Housing Conference.

In World War II, Mr. Horne served in the Navy and later was a captain in the Naval Reserves.

He was also a governor of the Society of Financial Examiners and a former president of the Phi Kappa Alpha Memorial Foundatin. He was a member of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Sons of Confederate Veterans, the Elks Club, the National Press Club, the National Capital Democratic Club, the Metropolitan Club, the Newcomen Society, the Alabama Historical Society, Phi Beta Kappa, and several other honorary societies.

He is survived by his wife, the former Ruth F. Kleinman; two daughters, Linda Clark of Chapel Hill, N.C., and Susan Ewart of Columbia, S.C.; three sisters, Marvelle Brown of Hollywood, Fla., Lillian Bailey of Charlotte, N.C., and Louise Price of Clayton, Ala.; two brothers, Winfred Horne, also of Clayton, and Robert Horne of Eufaula, Ala., and four grandchildren.

A memorial service will be held at noon tomorrow in Immanuel Episcopal Church-on-the-Hill, 3606 Seminary Road, Alexandria.

The family suggests that expressions of sympathy be in the form of contributions to the John E. Horne Scholarship Fund at the University of Alabama and Troy State University.

HORNE, JOHN ELMER

On Tuesday, January 8, 1985, at his residence, John Elmer Horne of Alexandria, Va., husband of Ruth K. Horne; father of Mrs. Richard Clark, Chapel Hill, N.C., and Mrs. James Ewart of Columbia, S.C.; four sisters; two brothers; four grandchildren. Friends may call at the Everly Wheatley Funeral Home, 1500 W. Braddock Rd., Alexandria, Va., Wednesday from 7 to 9 p.m. Funeral service will be held 12 noon Thursday in the Seminary Chapel of the Virginia Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Va. Interment Arlington National Cemetery. Contributions may be made to the John E. Horne Scholarship Fund of the University of Alabama, Tuscaloosa, Ala., or to Troy State University, Troy, Ala.

JOHN E. HORNE

John E. Horne, 76, a former chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, an administrator of the Small Business Administration and aide to former Sen. John Sparkman (D-Ala.), died Jan. 8 at his home in Alexandria after a heart attack.

Mr. Horne was named to the Federal Home Loan Bank Board by President Kennedy in 1963 and he was chairman from 1965 until 1968. He resigned to become president and director of the Investors Mortgage Insurance Co. in Boston. He returned to Alexandria in 1971, but continued to work for the company until the late 1970s, when he formed his own consulting business.

Mr. Horne was born in Clayton, Ala., and graduated from the University of Alabama. He earned a master's degree in history there.

He was a textbook publishers' representative before World War II and served in the Navy during the war. He came to the Washington area in 1947 as administrative assistant to Sparkman. He became deputy administrator of the old Small Defense Plants Administration, predecessor to the Small Business Administration, in 1951, and later became administrator of that agency.

In 1953, Mr. Horne rejoined Sparkman's staff. In 1956, he was assistant campaign manager for the Democratic ticket of Adlai Stevenson and Sparkman in the presidential election. He was executive director of the National Citizens Committee for the Kennedy-Lyndon B. Johnson ticket in the 1960 presidential election.

In 1961, he returned to the Small Business Administration as administrator, and he served there until he was appointed to the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

Mr. Horne was a member and former vestryman at the Emmanuel-on-the-Hill Episcopal Church in Alexandria.

He is survived by his wife, Ruth, of Alexandria; two daughers, Mrs. Richard Clark of Chapel Hill, N.C., and Mrs. James Ewart of Columbia, S.C., and four grandchildren.

BIRMINGHAM MAYOR RICHARD ARRINGTON

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise today to share with my colleagues an article from the Birmingham Post-Herald about Dr. Richard Arrington, mayor of Birmingham.

As the chief executive of Alabama's largest city, Mayor Arrington has helped make Birmingham write an economic success story during the last 5 years, a success story which has benefited his entire constituency.

During Mayor Arrington's tenure, the city of Birmingham has seen a great deal of new construction and renovation, new industry, and, in large part, an overall economic transition from a heavily industrial base to a largely service economy. Birmingham's business leaders have credited the mayor's contributions with playing a large part in these progressive developments. From creating the impression of a city in the forefront of economic and social progress, to successfully managing the city budget, to developing a good relationship with the business community, Richard Arrington has been credited with helping to create a stable political and economic environment in Birmingham—an environment that has served to boost the city, its surroundings, and the entire State.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from the Birmingham Post-Herald of January 8, 1985, be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GARNERING PRAISE: BUSINESSES THANK ARRINGTON FOR SUCCESS

(By Andrew Kilpatrick)

Birmingham Mayor Richard Arrington gets high marks from Birmingham business leaders, who say he has been an important figure in the city's economic progress.

They say he has a pretty good sense of business even though he doesn't profess to be a businessman.

They say he has a real rapport with Birmingham's business leaders and that he is a good administrator.

They point out that he has personally helped with plans for such landmarks as the Financial Center, the SouthTrust Building under construction and the renovation of the new National Bank of Commerce headquarters downtown.

They credit him with bettering race relations, which in turn creates a better environment for the private sector to prosper.

They see him as a man who has grown in the job and who can concentrate on the issues as he serves his second term.

Some say that if he doesn't understand all the intricacies of tax credits and bond issues, he can leave that to others.

But they also say he has a good understanding of the city budget, much of which he handles personally instead of relying heavily on staffers, as was sometimes the case with past mayors.

Judy Thompson, president of Thompson Tractor, said, "He's the best thing that's happened to Birmingham in years.

"I give him a lot of credit for improving the city in a time of a poor economic climate," she said, adding that Arrington has kept in mind his whole constituency and not just a narrow part of it.

She said she thinks the mayor has looked realistically at what high-technology industries Birmingham can attract.

The mayor has been realistic in his understanding that industry is difficult to attract, that there are only so many new industries considering new operations in Alabama and that often the better course is to encourage industry already here to expand, she said.

Further, she said, "He's very accessible, very open."

Buffalo Rock Chairman Jimmy Lee said, "He has a fine rapport with the business community.

"He's grown and matured on the job."

Lee recalls that Arrington and some Birmingham business leaders had to go to Washington, D.C., to see Sen. Howell Heflin and officials of the Mead Corp. so that Birmingham and Homewood could obtain land for a research and development park.

He said Arrington's role was the key to getting the land.

SouthTrust Corp.'s Wallace Malone said, "I think he does a very good job," at a difficult time when Birmingham faced a severe recession, high unemployment and a particularly heavy loss of jobs in the steel industry.

"He's very able, extremely conscientious."

However, "Like any mayor of any big city, nobody is going to agree with everything he does," Malone said.

"I think he has pretty doggone good business sense," Malone said.

Arrington must answer to about 300,000 people, which is far more complex a matter than a top business executive's answering to a board of directors and stockholders, Malone said.

"Dick Arrington has been smooth. He's not erratic, not crazy and he doesn't make wild statements. He's got his feet on the ground," Malone said.

Tom Rast, chairman of the board of the Johnson Rast & Hays Co. Inc. real estate development firm, said, "He has done a good job. . . . He has a lot of vision."

He said the mayor has had a big hand not only in the Financial Center and South-Trust Building but in seeing that downtown has more parking space. He said Arrington has done all that can be expected in the way of getting Urban Development Action Grants and other federal government money for development.

"I don't agree with him on everything he does," Rast said.

For example, Rast said he thinks Arrington should have given more consideration to South Central Bell's bid to supply a telephone system for City Hall when the company had done so much for the city.

Rast also said Arrington has grown on the job even though he entered office without very much political experience.

Before being elected mayor, Arrington was a school administrator and City Council member.

Sonat Inc. Chairman Henry Goodrich described Arrington as "effective" and "well educated," a man who has been good for the community.

Birmingham, he said, could be a lot worse off with someone else as mayor, adding that Arrington has developed good relationships with the business community.

In the past, Sonat has provided executives to do a city budget study, and Goodrich said Arrington himself has a full understanding of the budget, whereas in some past administrations, only the staff understood it.

Louis Willie, executive vice president of Booker T. Washington, Insurance Co., said Arrington has created "a positive image with the business community, which is probably one of his strengths."

When you consider the city's finances are not in difficulty, that its services have not been cut, . . . that there have been some raises, if not substantial, for city employees and that the city has a good credit rating—then I think you have to say the city is being run in a businesslike manner," Willie said.

Alabama Power Co. President Joe Farley said the decision to build his company's new headquarters in downtown Birmingham was helped by the fact that Arrington is mayor.

Farley said Alabama Power wanted to remain downtown and probably would have even if Arrington were not mayor, but "it made us much more comfortable."

Farley said he thinks Arrington has convinced the business community he genuinely wants its suggestions and ideas.

"He's a good mayor—good for the city. . . . He's brought stability to the city," Farley said.

Mike Calvert, executive director of Operation New Birmingham, said Arrington's leadership in business matters can be seen from last week's opening of the National Bank of Commerce headquarters in the old Woodward Building.

Many leaders praise Arrington's role in the $6 million renovation project, in which the city helped with a series of assistance efforts.

For example, the city's help involved a UDAG grant, tax-exempt bonds and bonds for the parking deck. The building also was designated a historic building, which gave it a tax credit.

"He understands the finances and he's a good administrator. Many politicians are politicians first and managers second or not at all," Calvert said.

He said Arrington is to be credited with the stable political climate in Birmingham and he said business leaders who consider setting up businesses in Birmingham and whom Calvert introduces to the mayor come away "quite reassured."

MAYOR AVOIDS TAKING CREDIT FOR LOCAL ECONOMY

"We have made fair to good economic progress," says Mayor Richard Arrington, assessing economic progress in Birmingham in his five years as mayor.

"We have been in an economic transition for 10 to 15 years from heavy industry to a service economy," and he said Birmingham was particularly hard hit by the recession several years ago.

But Birmingham has made progress and Arrington thinks he has helped, although he said the economic progress here "is basically the work of others."

"I hope I have helped some but mostly other people have done the work. The mayor's role is in part symbolic."

He said it's important that the mayor be perceived as caring about the city's race relations, "as indeed I am."

"I believe I convey that to people," he said.

The mayor can particularly help by encouraging progress, instilling pride and bringing together the goals of both blacks and whites, he said.

"I think there is a sense that positive things are happening in this city."

He said there have not been many racial problems and those few have been handled quietly.

Arrington lists as accomplishments the revitalization of downtown including the Financial Center and South Trust Building, housing improvements, the commercial redevelopment of North Birmingham and the industrial parks as sites for research and for businesses to locate cheaply, and the revitalization of Five Points South.

Perhaps the crowds at fashionable Highlands Bar & Grill symbolize the new popularity of that area.

"Birmingham may be the nation's best-kept secret," Arrington said, "No longer a symbol of racial strife, Birmingham is watching as its neighborhoods improve, as historic structures are restored and as downtown becomes a hub of the metropolitan area again."

He said downtown has the enviable problem of facing an office space shortage, whereas a number of cities are faced with a glut.

Downtown's new public library has been as magnificent as dreamers had hoped, he said, and the new YMCA will mean further development along 21st Street.

North Birmingham and Five Points South have both received national awards for successful revitalization programs.

"I hope I have become more knowledgeable," Arrington said, responding to praise that he has grown in the office.

"I didn't have the sophistication in finance and business when I came into office. Had I been a bit more sophisticated about financial matters, I probably could have pulled off the Block 60 project," he said.

He said that perhaps an accusation that he is too naive or trusting applies, adding that he may have a tendency to believe in deals when he is told they are in place and that the financing is there.

Arrington said he sees sustained, but not explosive, economic growth for Birmingham for the rest of the decade.

"I see us cutting the unemployment rate to 4 percent by 1990 if there is no national recession," he said.

The jobless rate in the Birmingham area is 9.5 percent.

Arrington said he thinks the race track will create a number of jobs and that the track will create spinoff jobs in other areas, such as the hotel industry.

CONDITION OF SOVIET JEWRY CONTINUES TO DETERIORATE

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, on January 30, 1985, I participated in the Congressional Coalition for Soviet Jews' first "Emergency Action for Soviet Jews," a conference designed to call attention to the plight of Jewish refuseniks and prisoners of conscience in the U.S.S.R. The event was highly successful, with some 550 persons in attendance, including, I am pleased to say, many Pennsylvanians. As a member of the coalition's steering committee and long-time supporter of Soviet Jewry, I was especially gratified to see such a large turnout.

The coalition's inauguration was particularly important, Mr. President, because the condition of Soviet Jewry today continues to deteriorate. In 1979, some 51,000 Soviet Jews were allowed to emigrate from the U.S.S.R. By 1982, when I traveled to the Soviet Union to meet with refuseniks in Moscow and Kiev and to press the Soviet authorities on their emigration policies, the number of Jews allowed to leave was down to less than 3,000. In 1984, when I applied for a visa to take this matter up again with Soviet authorities, the number of Jewish emigrants totaled fewer than 900. Tellingly, my request for a visa in 1984 was denied.

Moreover, the reduction in emigration witnessed in 1984 has coincided with a severe crackdown on Soviet Jews who seek to preserve their heritage by teaching the Hebrew language and Jewish history. Recent jailings of a number of Jewish educators, including Yuli Edelshtein, Yakov Levy, Joseph Berenshtein, and Aleksandr Kholmiansky, to name just a few, on trumped-up charges ranging from drug-dealing to "anti-Soviet slander," have clearly highlighted one of the most odious aspects of the Soviet regime—a basic disregard for the human rights of its citizenry.

During the course of yesterday's conference, I met with numerous individuals deeply concerned about life for Jews in the U.S.S.R. Among those that I spoke to was a representative of the Gratz College Senate, who shared my anguish over the ordeal of those who have been punished for bravely seeking to teach their brothers and sisters about the history and culture of Judaism, despite the obvious risks. The college, which is located in Philadelphia, was founded in 1895, and was the first nondenominational Hebrew teachers' college established in North America. Thus, it is especially fitting that their views on what can only be called the tragic situation of Soviet Jewish educators, as expressed in a recent letter to Soviet President Konstantin Chernenko, be known, and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, while the outlook for Soviet Jewry today is grim, we can be heartened by one thing. That is the fact that the plight of Jews in the U.S.S.R. continues to be a rallying point in the free world, and in fact is gathering strength. Through the efforts of private institutions like Gratz College, private citizens like the thousands who have written to me since I came to the Senate, and public officials who, like so many of my colleagues, have joined in hoisting this banner, we can impress upon the Soviet regime that the current situation must be changed. I am delighted to be a part of the Congressional Coalition for Soviet Jews, and look forward to continued cooperative efforts on behalf of those unable to speak out for themselves.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRATZ COLLEGE,
December 19, 1984.

CONSTANTIN CHERNENKO,
President, U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet, The Kremlin, Moskow:

Whereas the Hebrew teachers in the Soviet Union are being harassed and persecuted, we their colleagues in Jewish education at Gratz College in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania—(established 1895, as the first Hebrew Teacher's College in North America)—support them in their efforts to preserve Hebrew Language and culture.

Be it resolved that the Gratz College Senate expresses its protest at the treatment of teachers of Hebrew in the Soviet Union and implores the leadership of the Soviet Union to recognize the teaching of Hebrew as a legitimate profession and its study as an important cultural contribution to civilization. The great Soviet leader Lenin himself advocated the study and teaching of all languages desired by the many national minorities in the Soviet Union and freely chosen by them.

Respectfully submitted.

GRATZ COLLEGE SENATE.

A TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM R. "RUDDY" FAVRE

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it is with extreme sadness that I rise today to note the recent untimely death of Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney William R. "Ruddy" Favre, Jr., of Mobile, AL. Mr. Favre was a truly outstanding prosecutor; a dedicated public servant, and a fine man. I would have spoken earlier about my constituent and friend had the Senate been in session.

Favre has been with the U.S. attorney's office for 15 years, specializing almost exclusively in the prosecution of criminal cases. He had first been brought into that office during the first Nixon administration, stayed on during the Democratic Carter administration, and remained into the Reagan administration. In fact, he served briefly as ACTION U.S. attorney for the southern district of Alabama prior to confirmation of President Reagan's appointee for the post.

During his one and a half decades of service as a Federal attorney, Ruddy Favre built a tremendous reputation as a very successful prosecutor. In fact, in 1979, he was brought here to Washington to be honored for superior performance as an assistant U.S. attorney, an honor received by only 1 percent of our Nation's assistant U.S. attorneys.

Mr. President, having myself been a trial lawyer and having later served as a judge, it is my belief that it is usually the trial court to which aggrieved parties look for equity and justice. The vast majority of the numerous cases filed in Federal court never reach the Supreme Court, not because they are not meritorious, but because they have been disposed of and the parties have been given redress, at the trial level.

In turn, it is dedicated attorneys like "Ruddy" Favre who help our judicial system meet the stringent responsibilities placed on the trial court. I believe it is a clear testimony to his ability, fairness, and sense of justice that his funeral was attended by Federal and State judges, prosecutors and defense attorneys, and even persons whose convictions stemmed from Favre's prosecutions.

Mr. President, William R. "Ruddy" Favre, Jr., will be greatly missed. I wish to extend my sincerest sympathies to his wife, Katherine, and two daughters, Laura Hicks and Deborah Bender.

I ask unanimous consent that two articles from the Mobile Press Register be printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEART ATTACK FATAL TO "RUDDY" FAVRE

A wake for Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney William R. "Ruddy" Favre Jr., who died Christmas Day of a heart attack, will be held today at 5 p.m. at Radney Funeral Home here.

The 56-year-old dean of area prosecutors died of a massive heart attack which struck him at 5:30 p.m. at his residence.

A funeral Mass is scheduled at 10 a.m. Thursday at St. Pius X Catholic Church on Sage Avenue.

Favre had been with the United States attorney's office for 15 years, specializing almost exclusively in the prosecution of criminal cases.

He prosecuted a number of major federal cases over the years, and tried the government's case against City Commissioner Gary Greenough who was convicted by a federal jury on Dec. 6 on 14 counts of fraud, conspiracy and extortion.

Favre was hired as an assistant U.S. attorney by U.S. Attorney Charles White-Spunner Jr. during the first Nixon administration, stayed on during the Democratic Administration of Jimmy Carter under U.S. Attorney William Kimbrough, and during the Reagan administration under present U.S. Attorney Jeff Sessions.

Favre was named acting U.S. attorney for the U.S. Southern District of Alabama in April 1981, when Kimbrough left the post, pending the confirmation of Sessions' appointment as U.S. attorney.

U.S. Attorney Sessions said, "I considered Ruddy to be one of the finest prosecutors in the United States, no question about that. He was respected by both defense attorneys and prosecutors throughout this region.

"He was closer to me than a brother. All of us are heartbroken at his death.

"I don't believe Mobile has had a finer public servant in the last 15 years than Ruddy Favre.

"He loved the United States attorney's office, and his loyalty to it was unsurpassed . . . His leadership inspired all of us in the office and his support to me both professionally and personally has been invaluable."

White-Spunner, who is now an assistant in Sessions' office, said, "Ruddy was a longtime very good friend, both before he worked in this office and during the time that he did. He was very loyal to all the U.S. attorneys that he worked with. He always did in the most exceptional manner all the things he was asked to do. He continually provided outstanding leadership in the office. He was a very fine person as well as a very fine public servant. He'll be missed by all who knew him both personally and professionally."

Former U.S. Attorney William A. Kimbrough Jr. said simply "the world has lost a * * *."

"And I know his family has lost one of the best fathers and husbands any family could have," said Kimbrough. "I'm sure his memory will sustain them during this period of sorrow."

"Our profession has lost a very valuable member," Kimbrough said. "I think above all as a lawyer he was a professional. You'd sit there (in the courtroom) sometimes thinking nothing was happening and then all of a sudden you'd realize you'd been 'out-Ruddied.'"

FBI supervisory special agent Joseph A. Mahoney spoke of a "very special relationship with Ruddy in the FBI. He was an outstanding lawyer and prosecutor. There was a great deal of respect between him and our office."

"He was extremely supportive of the FBI as an assistant U.S. attorney and as acting U.S. attorney," said Mahoney. "Throughout the years he prosecuted many major and varied cases investigated by the FBI in the fields of gambling, bank robbery and public corruption and prosecuted the first major case in which the FBI had concurrent jurisdiction in drug investigations. We'll miss him as a professional in his capacity as a great lawyer and prosecutor and personally as a good friend."

Defense attorney Jim Atchison, who said he has known Favre for 16 years, said, "I think he is one of the greatest prosecutors who ever lived. He was one of the best, most efficient, most methodical prosecutors I've ever run up against." Atchison said, "I have respected him. He has always been a gentleman and if he gave you his word, you could depend on it. That meant a lot."

On learning of his death, attorney Barry Hess said, "He was a fine man, a fine lawyer. I trusted him. His word was gold. I can't say much more, I am shocked."

Attorney Tommy Haas said, "Ruddy was an old and dear friend. He must have been working too hard lately. We lost a great lawyer and fine man."

Mobile District Attorney Chris Galanos said, "Ruddy was a good and decent man who tried and succeeded in helping to clean up this community."

Mobile County Circuit Court Judge Ferrill McRae said, "He was a dedicated public servant of more than 15 years and was loved and respected by all he came in contact with. We will all miss his professional and diligent approach to prosecuting cases."

In 1979, Favre was honored in Washington, D.C., for superior performance as an assistant U.S. attorney, an honor received by only one percent of assistant U.S. attorneys in the nation.

A native of Mobile, Favre was a graduate of Murphy High School and Spring Hill College, and obtained his law degree at the University of Alabama.

He is survived by his wife, Katharine; two daughters, Laura Hicks and Deborah Bender, of Mobile; a sister, Mrs. Thomas Kimbrell Harris of Pascagoula, Miss.; and two grandchildren.

MOBILE SAYS FAREWELL TO "RUDDY" FAVRE

Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney William R. "Ruddy" Favre, Jr. was buried in Pine Crest Cemetery here Thursday afternoon following a funeral Mass that was attended by much of the city's legal community.

The service at St. Pius X Catholic Church was conducted by Rev. Sidney A. Tonsmeire S.J. and Father Francis V. Cusack.

Noting that the 56-year-old Favre's death of a heart attack on Christmas night left his friends "surprised, shocked and amazed," Tonsmeire said a closer examination of the circumstances surrounding the event reveals "something of God's hand in this."

"Life is a very tenuous thing," said Tonsmeire, adding that God provides us with "faith and hope" to "understand and interpret the meaning of God's calling our friend back to Him."

U.S. District Judges W. Brevard Hand, Emmett R. Cox, Virgil Pittman and Daniel Thomas were joined at the Sage Avenue church for the ceremony by the federal magistrates and bankruptcy judges and most of the Mobile County Circuit Court bench, Favre's colleagues in the U.S. Attorney's office, state prosecutors, countless defense attorneys, representatives from all branches of law enforcement and even persons whose convictions stemmed from Favre's prosecution.

Tonsmeire said he was "amazed and marveled at the wonderful things that were said about" Favre by his friends and peers.

It was apparent, said Tonsmeire, that Favre was an accomplished prosecutor although the priest has "never been in a position to experience his expertise, thank heavens."

A friend of the Favre family for years, Tonsmeire described the Mobile native as "an outstanding Christian man" who was "loved and respected for his integrity, his honesty and his justice."

Favre is survived by his wife, Catherine; two daughters, Laura Hicks and Deborah Bender, both of Mobile; a sister, Mrs. Thomas Kimbrell Harris of Pascagoula, Miss.; and two grandchildren.

VA ADJUDICATION PROCEDURE AND JUDICIAL REVIEW ACT

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am very pleased today to join Senator HART, Senator CRANSTON, Senator SIMPSON, Senator MURKOWSKI and my many other colleagues as a cosponsor of S. 367, the Veterans' Administration Adjudication Procedure and Judicial Review Act. This bill represents a significant improvement in the rights and ability of veterans to pursue claims for VA benefits. During my service in the Senate I have always been a strong supporter of veterans programs. Our Nation is extremely lucky to have had the service and protection of the thousands of dedicated men and women who served in the Armed Forces and I feel that we have a basic moral obligation to assist those veterans in their time of need.

I believe S. 367 offers veterans a fundamental legal protection routinely enjoyed by other citizens, including other claimants for Federal benefits—the right to pursue their case in a court of law. This bill is practically identical to bills previously reported by the Veterans' Affairs Committee and passed by the Senate in September 1979, in September 1982 and in June 1983. I was proud to support each of those measures then, and I am proud to support S. 367 today.

Mr. President, under current law, the Veterans' Administration is a unique agency because of the barring of court review of the agency's decisions on veterans' claims for benefits. Also unique is the fact that the law limits to $10 the amount which may be paid an attorney for representation of a veteran before the VA. I don't know many attorneys who would agree to take on such a case for only $10. It appears obvious to me that when a veteran pursues his claim all the way through the administrative channels and argues his case before the Board of Veterans Appeals, he may have real need for both legal counsel and the opportunity to seek further legal remedy. As I said before, such rights are allowed claimants for other Federal benefits, notably Social Security.

This bill would correct this inequitable situation and allow review of claims for VA benefits by the U.S. Federal court system, substantially improving a veterans' ability to successfully pursue a claim through impartial channels. The court would have the authority to decide constitutional and statutory questions and to rule on actions taken by the agency's Administrator. The $10 limitation on attorney fees would be maintained for services rendered before a final decision by the Board of Veterans Appeals. For cases represented within the VA administrative channels after a Board of Veterans Appeals decision, the Administrator could approve reasonable attorney fees up to a maximum of $500, or if the claimant and attorney have entered into a contingency-fee agreement, no more than 25 percent of any past-due benefits awarded. For cases reviewed in court and not resolved in a manner favorable to the claimant, the maximum fee the court could approve would be $750. For favorably resolved court cases, the court could approve a reasonable fee, or again, in the case of a contingency-fee agreement, a fee not in excess of 25 percent of the total past-due benefits awarded.

Other provisions in this bill improve the claims adjudication procedures of the Veterans' Administration to ensure that veterans receive improved and timely assistance in pursuing their claims. I feel that these efforts are vital since claims can currently take months upon end to settle, and such delays can impose severe financial and physical strain upon claimants.

Many veterans in Arkansas have shared their frustration with the current system with me. Many times they feel unnecessarily defeated by the system as they pursue benefits they believe to be rightfully theirs. These veterans are losing confidence in the system that was established to assist and protect them.

I think that these proposed changes to the existing laws are necessary to ensure the fundamental rights of veterans and their survivors. One of the basic tenets of our system of justice in this country is that everyone who has a legal claim should be entitled to a day in court before an impartial judge. Our veterans are entitled to no less. I therefore strongly urge each and every one of my colleagues to join in support of this important and just legislation so that we may once again see its passage and take the first significant step toward successfully guaranteeing complete basic legal rights for veterans.

Thank you, Mr. President.

SOVIET JEWRY

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator BOSCHWITZ and my other distinguished colleagues who have heeded the Congressional Call to Conscience with respect to the plight of Soviet Jewry. I commend my colleague from Minnesota, Senator BOSCHWITZ, for taking the lead in our effort to raise our voices on behalf of Jews in the Soviet Union.

Preserving national security and developing trade and commerce are essential elements of the foreign policies of all countries, including the United States. What has historically distinguished the conduct of American foreign policy from that of other states, however, is our abiding commitment to liberal-democratic values and to the principle of individual freedom from which these values derive.

Because we Americans have traditionally expressed openly our thoughts without fear of reprisal, chosen our houses of worship without Government interference, and traveled unfettered beyond our borders, we may tend to take our freedoms for granted. At such moments, Mr. President, it is chastening to remember how fortunate we are in comparison to the countless millions of people in countries throughout the world whose human rights are severely circumscribed or are denied altogether.

Mr. President, in Latin America there are hopeful signs that the process of democratization may be taking hold in Argentina, Brazil, and in other countries on the continent. Yet glaring human rights abuses continue to take place every day. In Chile, for example, the citizenry is not permitted to participate in the political process. The same is true in Cuba, where religious worship is also suppressed. Notwithstanding the recent elections in El Salvador and Nicaragua, the preservation of the dignity of the individual in those countries remains a tenuous proposition.

Equally flagrant violations of basic human rights—including freedom from physical harm—have become institutionalized in other parts of the world. In Cambodia, for example, people daily face the physical and psychological insecurity of a threatening environment with no semblance of the individual rights we Americans have historically enjoyed. In South Africa, a minority white government refuses to franchise the black majority. In Ethiopia, a repressive regime forcibly relocates its citizens rather than provide them with food to satisfy basic human needs.

Regrettably, Mr. President, the denial of human rights is not confined to the developing world. Throughout its empire, the Soviet Union systematically shackles the spirit of millions of people who live under its tyrannical rule. Nobel Prize laureate Andrei Sakharov and his wife, Yelena Bonner, have been persecuted because they dared to express views that were not sanctioned by the Government. Members of the Pentecostal faith, we will recall, took refuge in the American Embassy in Moscow because the Soviets would not permit them to practice their faith. The small group of Soviet citizens who tried to monitor their Government's compliance with its human rights obligations under the Helsinki Final Act have been either imprisoned or exiled. Indeed, last year three Ukrainian human rights activists died while serving sentences in Soviet labor camps.

No group in the Soviet Union, however, has been treated more harshly or suffered greater collective repression than Jews. The current campaign of persecution began in 1977-78 with the arrest and trial of Anatoly Shcharansky. As we know, Shcharansky was imprisoned on the contrived charge of spying for the United States.

The names of Shcharansky, Iosif Begun, Yuriy Tarnopolskiy, Aleksandr Yakir, and other prominent Jewish scholars and intellectuals who have been imprisoned are well known; and they have been the subject of Senate resolutions or letters which I have enthusiastically cosponsored or cosigned, calling on Soviet authorities to grant their release and their emigration. But, Mr. President, these individuals are simply the visible symbols—the tip of the iceberg—of a pervasive Soviet campaign that denies Jews the right to worship, emigrate, and to sustain their cultural identity.

During the past 6 months, 11 Hebrew teachers and Jewish cultural activists were arrested and 4 sentenced to labor camps for engaging in anti-Soviet agitation, slander, and propaganda. In fact, they were simply encouraging identification with one's religious heritage.

Refuseniks have been increasingly confined to psychiatric hospitals or exiled to Soviet prisons and labor camps. An estimated 10,000 Soviet citizens, many of them Jewish, have been incarcerated as political prisoners. Meanwhile, Soviet authorities refuse to provide information to Western governments or to human rights organizations about their conditions.

Emigration has consistently declined since the peak-year total of 51,000 in 1979. Last year, only 896 Jews were permitted to leave the Soviet Union, 30 percent less than in 1983 and 98 percent less than in 1979. Although the Soviets claim that all Jews who wish to leave have done so, the State Department has estimated that in excess of 400,000 Soviet Jews, or 20 percent of the Jewish community, would emigrate if they could.

The Soviet Government has engaged in propaganda designed to repress Jewish cultural activities. It has launched a vicious anti-Semitic campaign in the media centered on the "Anti-Zionist Committee on the Soviet Public." Cartoons, broadcasts, and articles increasingly equate Jewish culture with racism and compare Israel to Nazi Germany.

Finally, in this larger cultural context, Jews are systematically denied the opportunity to make full use of their talents within the Soviet Union. Jewish high school graduates are denied admission to the mathematics and science departments of Moscow State University and other prestigious institutes. Their parents are not likely to receive promotions in their professions.

Mr. President, we in Congress bear a responsibility to impress on Soviet officials, even as we seek in Geneva to redirect our relations on a politically constructive course, that Americans cannot ignore human rights abuses. We will therefore continue to denounce Soviet practices, as well as those of other countries, that seek to destroy the dignity of the individual because it is on the basis of this ideal that we came into existence as a nation.

OLIN B. KING: EXECUTIVE OF THE YEAR

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise today to share with my colleagues an honor recently awarded to a fellow Alabamian, Olin B. King.

Olin King, the chairman and chief executive officer and one of the founders of SCI Systems, Inc., was named "Executive of the Year" by the National Management Association. With this honor, he joined a distinguished roster of the Nation's foremost executives so honored since 1925.

SCI was founded in 1961 and, with Olin King's leadership, has developed from a three-man operation in his basement to a multinational corporation with almost $450 million in 1984 revenues.

Today, from its Huntsville, AL, headquarters, the company operates five manufacturing plants in north Alabama, a computer software center in Research Triangle Park, NC, and manufacturing facilities in Scotland and Singapore.

Mr. President, I am always thrilled by stories of initiative and success, such as the one Olin King has written at SCI Systems. I believe we should all be inspired by examples such as this. Of course, Olin King has been writing success stories for most of his life.

He earned his bachelor of science degree from North Georgia College at the age of 19, prior to doing graduate work in physics and electrical engineering at Emory University, Rutgers University, and the University of Pennsylvania. Before founding SCI, then known as Space Craft, Inc., he was associated with RCA, the Army Ballistic Missile Agency, and NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center.

At SCI, King has built a company providing a wide variety of high technology products and services including sophisticated missile, satellite, and aircraft electronics systems, high volume computer manufacturing, and several computer system product families.

In addition to his duties at SCI, Olin King is a dedicated and involved member of the civic community. He is a director of the Alabama Research Institute and a member of the Auburn University Research Advisory Council. He is involved with the Alabama Commission on Higher Education and the Governor's task force on economic recovery. He has served as director of the United Way of Madison County, Eagle chairman of the Tennessee Valley Chapter of the Boy Scouts of America, and president of the local chapter of the American Defense Preparedness Association.

Mr. President, the listing of Olin King's honors and activities could go on and on. To list them all would seem endless. To have listed none would seem an injustice.

Today, Mr. President, SCI Systems, Inc., its facilities, its success, and its continued growth all stand as monuments to Olin King and his hard work. On behalf of all Alabamians, I congratulate him on this great honor and thank him for all he has done for our State.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from the October 1984 issue of Manage magazine be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Manage Magazine, Oct. 1984]

OLIN B. KING NAMED EXECUTIVE OF THE YEAR

Throughout the dynamic growth of SCI Systems Inc., Olin B. King has managed the Company's interrelationship of people, funds, business and technology.

As the 1984 recipient of NMA's highest individual citation presented October 10, 1984 at NMA's National Conference, Mr. King joins a distinguished roster of the nation's foremost executives so honored by the Association since it was founded in 1925.

Olin B. King is chairman, chief executive officer and a founder of SCI Systems, Inc. Under his leadership, the company has grown from a three-man operation in the basement of his home, to a multinational 'Fortune 500' sized company. Fiscal year 1984 revenues were $437 million and the company's growth continues unabated.

SCI was founded in 1961. The Company provides a wide variety of high technology products and services including sophisticated missile, satellite and aircraft electronics systems, high volume computer manufacturing, and several computer system product families. Headquartered in Huntsville, Alabama, the company operates five manufacturing plants in north Alabama; a computer software center in Research Triangle Park, North Carolina; and manufacturing facilities in both Scotland and Singapore. Regional sales offices are maintained in more than a dozen major U.S. cities.

King's formula for success is direct. "Provide high quality products at attractive prices." Emphasis upon customer responsiveness and organizational efficiency complete his equation.

His success story serves as an example for others. He actively encourages employees to develop themselves within the company and regards SCI's National Management Association chapter as a primary tool in this development process. King describes his company's management style as 'distributed autocracy.' "This means that we extensively rely upon individual judgement and action at multiple levels rather than depend upon committees in the decision making process," he elaborated.

King was born in a small town in Georgia in 1934. He received a Bachelor of Science degree from North Georgia College in 1953. He did graduate work in physics and electrical engineering at Emory University, Rutgers University and the University of Pennsylvania. He served as an officer in the U.S. Army Signal Corps during the Korean War. Prior to founding SCI—then known as Space Craft, Inc.—he was associated with RCA, the Army Ballistic Missile Agency and NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center.

King has authored numerous engineering and business papers, including several definitive papers on pioneering satellite designs. He holds over a dozen patents for electronic circuits and mechanical devices. A recent personal invention, the Rotary Printer, was named by Industrial Research Magazine as one of a selected list of 100 most significant new products.

In addition to his responsibilities at SCI, King serves as a director of the First Alabama Bank of Huntsville, N.A., as a director of First Alabama Bancshares Inc., as president of Crown Properties, Inc. and as a director of Delta Communications, Inc.

In recent years he has been very active in state and local affairs. He is a director of the Alabama Research Institute and is a member of the Auburn University Research Advisory Council. He has served as trustee of the Alabama Heritage Trust Fund; a member of the Council of Twenty-one, Alabama Commission on Higher Education; and a member of the Governor's Task Force on Economic Recovery. Locally he is a director of the High Technology Resources Foundation, vice chairman and a trustee of the Huntsville Hospital Foundation, a director of The Chamber of Commerce of Huntsville/Madison County, a director of the Huntsville Museum of Art, a member of the Research Park Board of the City of Huntsville and a member of the University of Alabama in Huntsville's Science and Engineering Advisory Committee. He has served as director of the United Way of Madison County, Eagle chairman of the Tennessee Valley chapter of the Boy Scouts of America and president of the local chapter of the American Defense Preparedness Association.

In recognition of his vigorous support of both higher education and economic development in Alabama, King was awarded an honorary Doctorate by the University of Alabama in 1983. SCI's NMA chapter presented him with the Silver Knight of Management in 1975 and the Sunbelt Council of NMA Chapters awarded him the Gold Knight of Management in 1983.

DR. ANNA FISHER

Mr. LEAHY. Mr President, one of the most extraordinary people in our Government is Dr. Anna Fisher. Dr. Fisher, her husband, Dr. William Fisher, and their daughter, Kristin, are an inspiration to all Americans.

My family and I have gotten to know Dr. Fisher through the space program, and it was with great pride that we saw a recent article in the October 28, 1984, issue of Parade magazine. So that it can be shared with the rest of the country, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHEN MOM IS AN ASTRONAUT

By Aimee Lee Ball

Kristin Anne Fisher, age one, likes to watch the lift-off of spaceships on TV and shout, "Jet! Jet!" In a few days, there may be other equally precocious toddlers watching the space shuttle Discovery blast off from its launch pad at Cape Canaveral, but Kristin will be the first child ever to watch her mother ride a missile bound for outer space. Remember, for what will surely be a question on some 21st-century edition of Trivial Pursuit: The first astronaut-mother is Anna Fisher.

When Anna joined the space program in 1978, one of its first six women, she was a physician with a practice in emergency medicine. She was also a newlywed—she and William Fisher had met when both were medical residents in California, working toward the same specialty—and the couple were honeymooning when NASA summoned Anna for an interview. Both Fishers grew up as "Army brats," both with a passionate interest in space travel. On Bill's first-grade report card, the teacher noted that he spent too much time drawing rockets. And, at 12, Anna says, she speculated that "by the time I grew up, there were going to be space stations, and they'd need doctors." Both applied to NASA—the first step was filling out a U.S. Civil Service application, and in the space marked "Kind of position you are filing for," they simply wrote "Astronaut." After months of grueling tests, Anna was accepted. Bill followed two years later.

A two-astronaut family makes for a hectic household. NASA is a rigorous employer, and the Fishers each went through navigation and flight training, land- and water-survival, simulations of weightlessness, studies of mechanics, meteorology, astronomy, physics and computers, in addition to keeping up in their own field of expertise by working in hospital emergency rooms. One year they were apart 130 nights out of 365—Bill counted. When people asked if they were planning on having a child. Bill used to say they were having trouble watering their plants. They joked that in their spacious home, where each of them had a study, there would be a fight to the death over which room became the nursery, and a baby might have to rent space at a motel down the road.

But raising a family was a pleasure Anna was not willing to relinquish in order to have a space-age career. (She's a pioneer at combining the two: Soviet cosmonaut Valentina Tereshkova also is a mother, but her daughter was born a year after her spaceflight.) "I've always wanted to have a family—that was never a question," says Anna, "but I'd always hoped the timing would work out so that I would fly first and find out if this is what I want to do. If I found I was one of those people who is miserably sick in space, perhaps I wouldn't want to fly again, and then the question would have been academic. If I was like a lot of other people in the astronaut office who say, 'It's neat, and it's so neat that it's worth waiting 20 years, and oh, boy' I want to go right away again'—if I was one of those people, which I suspect I probably will be, I figured I'd deal with the decision at that point. Perhaps it would be OK to take a little bit of time off, depending on how my career was going."

"When we first got to Houston, "she recalls, "we were told we'd all be flying within three or four years, and now we're into the sixth year. We're here considerably longer than we originally expected. That's just the way things go. And so when we decided to have Kristin, it was just a matter of looking at how old I was [she's now 35, he's 38] and the risks of maternal complications and not being sure you can get pregnant right away when you want to. I wasn't assigned to a crew, so for me it was a scary decision. I didn't have any real confidence I was helping my career. But I felt it was important enough."

Anna probably had one of the more unusual pregnancies, although no one but Bill knew about it for the first five months (Anna didn't want to be grounded from flying T-38s, NASA's two-seater jet trainers). At one point, she was called upon to be at the Kennedy Space Center in Florida as the Astronaut Support Person, or ASP, the one who straps all the crew members in when they go for launch. "So far, they hadn't had a woman do that job," she recalls, "and the reason was: If they had a contingency on the launch pad [contingency is NASA-speak for sudden emergency] and all the crewmen were unconscious, it would be the responsibility of the ASP to rush in and try to rescue them and carry them out. Some of those people are 6 feet tall and weigh 200 pounds." Anna is 5 feet 4, weighs 110 pounds soaking wet and looks like a hothouse flower.

"They were going to have a test," she continues, "where I would demonstrate how a woman could haul these big, burly guys out of the orbiter. At that point, I was four months pregnant and hadn't told anyone yet. And I couldn't think of any excuse as to why I didn't want to do this test. Bill said, 'Anna, if you do that, I'm going to shoot you.' And I said 'Bill, if you can think of a way for me to get out of it without telling them I'm pregnant, fine. Otherwise, I'm going to do it.' I was not going to harm Kristin—I'd already had an amniocentesis. I knew it was a girl, and we'd already named her Kristin, so to me she was real. I was not going to do anything to harm that baby. I got out there, and I did it. It was hard physical work. It was a hot day in Florida, and I had breathing equipment on, and I carried somebody out of the commander's seat and another guy out of the pilot's seat. And nobody knew I was pregnant. About a month later, it got to be time to tell people I wasn't gaining all this weight because I'd been eating too much. It was a relief when I finally got to tell. But the guy who had sent me to do that test was very chagrined."

That attitude is understandable. Even though there are two other mothers in NASA's space program. Bill Fisher says. "We still work among a bunch of people who basically believe that pregnancy is a disease state. At the hospital, we're working with people who are familiar with the fact that women can be pregnant and do a job. But in the astronaut office, it was a new thing." Anna made few concessions to her condition. As she got bigger, she simply borrowed former astronaut Alan Shepard's old spacesuit, and she would run around on her busiest days talking to her stomach, saying. "Kristin. I don't need a good baby. I need a great baby." She went snow skiing five months into her pregnancy and water-skiing two weeks before delivery. That was one of the few time Bill wanted to yell. "That's my kid in there too!" but to no avail. "Being a doctor helps." he says. "I know how well that baby's protected. It's unbelievably well protected. We finally compromised on two skis—no slaloming. And she broke that rule twice." She didn't even slow down for childbirth. She delivered on a Friday and was back at work on Monday.

Anna Fisher is a good astronaut ("I'm no longer wondering." she says. "'Will I be able to do this?' I've been in enough simulations, seen enough malfunctions, made enough dumb mistakes"). She's a good doctor (All the people she's saved in emergency rooms would attest to that.) She's even a good citizen (Since she'll be in preflight quarantine during the Presidential election on Nov. 6, she's voting by absentee ballot.) But is she a good mother? That will be the question on millions of minds when the first astronaut-mother goes up, leaving a year-old daughter behind.

"When I first had Kristin," she remembers, "I got a letter from someone to that effect. It took me aback. I showed it to Bill, who tore it up and said, 'Don't read these things.' Everyone puts so much stock in the mother being more important to the early development of a child, but I think both parents are equally important. I do not think the first year is critical, and I've been fortunate in being around for quite a bit of Kristin's first year. There's a lot I look forward to, but I think Bill and I have gotten her to where she's going to be a certain type of person, no matter what. We've insured that she has a lot of sources of love and devotion. But I made my commitment to NASA before I made my decision to have a family, and I can't back out of that commitment.

Certainly there are other women who put themselves at some risk in their work—police officers, athletes, even architects and construction workers, who must climb out on scaffolding. And it could be argued that a woman who smokes two packs of cigarettes a day is putting her child in more danger of being orphaned that an astronaut. But still, some people will look at Anna Fisher's adventurous occupation and think: "How dare you?"—an attitude that makes Bill Fisher, for one, defensive. "This is not 1900," he says, "and How dare you?" is no different for a woman that for a man. A child has two parents. No one says, 'Omigod, how could you leave your family?' to a male astronaut."

Anna and Bill have necessarily had the kind of conversations that, they say, anyone in the aviation professions must have, the kind that begin. "What if something happened to me?" And this particular space flight is fairly complicated, its purpose being the retrieval of two $40 million satellites locked in useless orbit. "But most people who aren't involved in the space program don't realize how much testing goes on," says Anna, "all the levels of redundancy designed into those computers to be able to detect a problem and make the right decision in critical seconds. As a mother, there are certain things I wouldn't do because I think there is too much risk and because I feel a responsibility to Kristin not to do something knowingly that could harm me. But for me to be a good mother, I have to be happy with myself. And my job's very important to me. I'm the kind of person who needs to be doing things to be happy. And when I'm happy, I'm a better person to anyone I'm supporting. I think, in the long run, Kristin winds up benefiting from this particular arrangement."

Bill's only responsibility for this flight is to select Anna's music—She's allowed five tapes—and he plans to stick in a lot of songs like "Mamas, Don't Let Your Babies Grow Up To Be Cowboys." As for those people who wonder if Bill isn't feeling jealous that Anna gets to fly first, here's her answer: "We've agreed I"ll go out and try it before my husband goes—you know, women and children first." The only "spousal communication" allowed during the mission is in brief messages. "I always thought they were made up," Bill admits, "like, 'Your family is real excited and wishes you well.'" The left-on-earth spouse is not encouraged to forward questions about domestic crises, like, "Where did you leave the car keys, Honey?" Although, Bill explains, he may have to do some of that: "We have a sweeper in our pool that sucks up sand dirt, and it uses panty hose over the top. I left the panty hose out one day, and Anna hid them. If she's up there, and I miss something like that, I may have to send a message: 'Bill says "hi" and wants to know where the panty hose are.'"

Anna and her four male crewmates will go into quarantine a week before their lift-off, now scheduled for Nov. 7. It's not just to insure that the astronauts don't get last-minute chicken pox. "It's sort of to isolate you from the world emotionally," Anna says, "to let you start focusing on the mission, so you don't go home and worry about mowing the lawn." Sure she's worried about leaving her daughter for such a long time, but, she says, "It's going to be a lot harder on me than on her." Bill reminds Anna, "The world isn't going to stop because you don't take care of her—there are a lot of people taking care of her," to which Anna replies with maternal smugness, "I take care of her better than anybody." Among the mother's helpers on ground duty during the eight-day flight will be the young housekeeper Anna calls Kristin's substitute mom, and Anna's own mother, Elfriede Tingle. If you think Geraldine Ferraro's mother is proud of her daughter, you should meet Anna Fisher's mother. The German-born woman was proud when Anna became the first in her family to earn a college degree, prouder still when she became a doctor, but her being an astronaut, says Anna, was "an immigrant's dream come true."

Launch dates for this and other shuttles have been postponed a number of times, and while Anna is anxious to get this show on the road, she says. "Each time the launch date slips, Kristin is a little older, and I'm excited that she'll remember more. I look forward to talking it over with her some day. She's so independent already. I think she will be the kind of child who will adjust very well to all the things we're doing and be glad she has all these opportunities."

And what does a husband say to a wife making perhaps the ultimate business trip? Simply. "See you when you get back, Honey. Have a good one."

THE FAMILY CIRCUS

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, for years my family and I have thoroughly enjoyed "The Family Circus" by Bil Keane. With three children ranging from 14 to 21 years old, we are constantly reminded of things about their early years by this extraordinarily perceptive work.

Bil Keane is able to reach out to all parts of our country and to virtually every family on a consistent daily basis. One of my proud possessions is an autographed cartoon showing the family visiting Washington, DC. In one panel he captured all the frustrations a family feels when they try to convince the children that the monuments in our capital are at least as important as what is on television.

Mr. President, Bil Keane and "The Family Circus" are truly national treasures, and I ask unanimous consent that an article entitled "The Keane Eye for Family Foibles," by William E. Smart, which appeared in the Washington Post on December 3, 1984, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE KEANE EYE FOR FAMILY FOIBLES

(By William E. Smart)

For Bil Keane, being a family man has paid off.

While other artists may have to plumb their souls for inspiration, he only had to observe the going-on in his own home. The result: one of the most popular, long-running (and uncynical) daily newspaper cartoons.

When Keane began "The Family Circus" in 1960, he worked in a studio attached to this Paradise Valley, Ariz., home, and his kids were small and underfoot. Consequently, "I enjoyed drawing the foibles and funny situations in a typical family with small children."

At the time, there already were a number of successful strips stressing the comic aspects of family life—"Dennis the Menace," started in 1951 by Hank Ketcham; Charles Schulz's "Peanuts," begun in 1950, and "Blondie," created in 1930 by Chic Young—but Keane found that he had something different.

"I realized that the cartoons that gathered most comment and that people really seemed to love were the ones that weren't necessarily funny, but had a typical situation they could identify with."

An early Keane cartoon showed Jeffy toddling into the living room late one night while Mommy and Daddy were watching TV. Jeffy: "I don't feel so good. I think I need a hug."

Letter flooded in, says Keane, 61. "I realized it hadn't been done in cartoon form before—where somebody touched on those tender moments. Then I sought them out."

The idea for the strip came when the then-36-year-old Keane was ending a 15-year stint as staff artist with The Philadelphia Bulletin newspaper and moving west to launch a new career as a syndicated cartoonist.

"I called the feature 'The Family Circle,' and drew it in a circle," he says, "because I felt it was distinctive and fit right in with the mood." It focused on the daily life in a family populated by Mom, Dad, Billy, Dolly and Jeffy.

The strip went originally to 19 newspapers. Within six months, Keane found himself threatened with a lawsuit. Family Circle magazine said that was their title and insisted that Keane change the name of his feature. "At that time, with just a few newspapers, running into a long legal battle wasn't worth the money to my syndicate the Register and Tribune Syndicate, Des Moines, so I changed the 'le' to 'us' and made it 'The Family Circus.'"

Over the years, Keane continued using his own family—wife Thel, daughter Gayle, and sons Neal, Chris and Jeff—as subjects for his "paper" family. In fact, he sometimes mixes them up. "I live with these situations and these characters, and I get to love them so much that Billy, Dolly, Jeffy and PJ the baby, although based on our own children, are separate to me."

They even show up in his dreams, Keane admits, along with his and Thel's own children. "I can't separate the real-life family from my family that I have created on paper."

Keane mixups have occasionally caused some real-life confusion: In 1962, he realized that Jeffy, though he was only a toddler, was too old for some of the baby situations—diapers, baby food, high chair. Keane needed a newborn, an infant.

"My wife was outside the studio working in her garden, the flower bed. I thought it would be a good idea to show Mommy pregnant in the cartoon and then have the baby born.

"I ran out of the studio and said, 'Thel, what would you think of adding a new baby to the family?' She said, 'Well, it's all right, but let me finish the weeding first.' PJ was born in the daily cartoon on Aug. 1, 1962. It's short for Paul John."

Some of the cartoons come from Keane's own experiences as a youngster, growing up in Philadelphia. In one strip, Jeffy is upstairs sleeping in his bed when Mommy and Daddy raise their voices in an argument. He wakes up, sweating and on the verge of tears. In the next panel, they make up and Jeffy calms down. In the final panel, they kiss and Jeffy is asleep again.

Says Keane: "I can remember lying up in my bed and hearing my mother and father arguing about something and just being frozen, where I couldn't get to sleep and I was perspiring. The world was wrong at that point, until I heard their voices back to normal, and then you realize everything is normal and you go back to sleep."

Years later, when Keane's son Jeff, now 26, was helping him work on the just-published The Family Circus Album: A 25th Anniversary Celebration (Fawcett Columbine, $7.95), Jeff told him: "Dad, I thought you drew that cartoon about me, because I remember that myself."

Our children and grandchildren are different from when we were small, notes Keane. Different in language, attitudes and knowledge, but "in their innocence and frankness, in saying the wrong thing at the wrong time, in mispronouncing a word or innocently evoking an emotion such as nostalgia or love," the generations don't change.

That, says Keane, is another reason he doesn't just go for the funny bone. "Sometimes I'll throw out cartoon ideas that are funny because they're a little too exaggerated, too trumped up, and I'll substitute something that's more tender, that will cause a tear in the eye or a tug at the heart."

His readers apparently approve, and they let Keane know when they don't. He averages 100-150 cards and letters each week and tries to personally answer "as many as I can."

"Family Circus" now appears in around 1,100 newspapers, with an estimated 50 million-plus readers weekdays and Sundays. (A cartoonist with that circulation could expect to make roughly $400,000 a year from syndication and licensing.)

And Keane has had his share of personal recognition, perhaps capped last year when his peers voted him winner of the National Cartoonists Society's Reuben Award as "Cartoonist of the Year." Twice previously they had elected him president of the society.

That the feature continues to grow in popular acceptance can be seen in its most recent growth: Somewhere between 200-250 newspapers have been added to its client list over the last two years. "If a new comic strip gets 50 to 75 sales in its first year or so, you're doing a pretty good job," says Register and Tribune Syndicate executive Tom Norquist. "To add as many as Bill has after this long is unheard of."

"The reason that any strip endures of 25 years is that it finds a niche. You have to have some kind of hook to make it through the changes and cycles that the country goes through."

The Keanes' real-life children are now all grown. Chris, 28, is a Santa Barbara marine biologist; Glen, 30, a Los Angeles free-lance film animator; Neal, 33, a Los Angeles computer engineer; Jeff, 26, a Los Angeles actor; Gayle, 35, owner and operator of Bloomin-Gayle's, a Sacramento plant shop. Cartoon inspiration now often comes from four grandchildren.

And the "paper" kids are doing fine. In fact, they've hardly aged. "I had PJ grow on a slow-motion basis to 18 months old," explains Keane, "so Jeffy grew to be 3. Dolly is 5 and in kindergarten. Billy went from first to second grade. He's 7 years old.

"I figured 'If I keep this up, in no time, Billy's going to be 13 by our 25th anniversary,' so I froze them at those ages. Now, if I could just get that to work for myself, I'd be home free."

SOVIET JEWRY

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join in the 1985 call to conscience in behalf of Soviet Jewry, and I want to commend my distinguished colleague from Minnesota, Senator BOSCHWITZ, for his leadership in this important effort.

It is especially fitting that the U.S. Senate reflect on the treatment of Soviet Jews at this time. Our Nation is about to embark on renewed arms negotiations with the Soviet Union. It is therefore appropriate at this time to consider the Soviets' refusal to abide by numerous other agreements—including those meant to protect human rights, most notably the Helsinki accords.

Nearly a decade ago, the Soviet Union joined the United States and many other nations in signing the Helsinki agreement. The right of every individual to practice and express his religious faith is its most fundamental guarantee. The right of free emigration is also preserved. Yet by its treatment of the Jews, the Soviet Union violates the Helsinki accords and ignores the most basic of human rights.

In response to heartfelt expressions of faith, the Soviet leadership has torn a page from the darkest and most repressive chapters of Soviet history. As a result, the plight of the Soviet Jews has rarely been worse.

Over the past few years, the Soviets have slammed the door on the many Jews who wish to emigrate. The Jewish exodus from the Soviet Union had increased steadily during the 1970's, and more than 50,000 Jews were permitted to leave that nation in 1979. Since then, the Soviets have severely constricted the flow of emigrants. In 1984, fewer than 1,000 Soviet Jews were allowed to leave.

In effect, the Soviets have imprisoned their Jewish population. And in recent years, the conditions of their imprisonment have grown markedly worse. The Soviet regime routinely closes synagogues and confiscates prayer books. The government continues to ban Hebrew language instruction as part of its program for destroying the Jewish culture.

The most fervent and vocal dissidents are also the most vulnerable. The Soviet police regularly plant drugs or weapons in the homes of refuseniks and religious leaders, only to arrest them on charges of possessing contraband or engaging in subversive activities.

In a recent article in the New York Times, Elie Wiesel wrote that Jews in the Soviet Union were entering a dark and threatening time. "They are counting on our human solidarity in order to standfast," he wrote. "If we deny it to them, we are condemning them to solitude and despair. As for ourselves, we shall never be forgiven for any indifference."

The congressional call to conscience is one means of affirming our solidarity, and I join Senator BOSCHWITZ in urging my colleagues to take part. We are further reminded of the plight of Soviet Jews by the invaluable efforts of the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews, the National Conference of Soviet Jewry, and the Student Coalition for Soviet Jewry.

These and other groups maintain the transcendent bond of faith that links us with the Soviet Jews. In my own State of Virginia, the Union of Councils Chapter in Newport News long ago adopted a particular refusenik, Igor Guberman. Mr. Guberman was recently released from a Soviet prison, and I join the members of the Newport News council in praying that he will soon be allowed to leave the Soviet Union entirely.

As free men and women, we rejoice whenever another joins our ranks. But we are obliged to remember the hundreds of thousands of Jews who remain imprisoned in the Soviet Union, struggling daily for the fundamental right to worship God.

VIETNAM VETERANS' MEMORIAL DEDICATION

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, on Veterans Day, I had the honor of participating in the dedication ceremony for the Vietnam Veterans' Memorial in Washington, DC.

The dedication ceremony was the culmination of the efforts of the Vietnam Veterans' Memorial Fund Committee headed by Mr. Jan Scruggs.

Speakers at the ceremony included President Reagan; Secretary of the Interior, William P. Clark; Congressman DAVID BONIOR of Michigan; the Rt. Rev. John T. Walker; chairman of the board of the Vietnam Veterans' Memorial Fund, Mr. John P. Wheeler III; Brig. Gen. (retired) George Price; commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Mr. Billy Ray Cameron; vice commander of the American Legion, Mr. Robert Turner; Mr. Francis Whitebird; Jan Scruggs, and myself.

Because the dedication of this memorial was such an important event for our country and especially for Vietnam veterans and because this event so effectively served to heal the wounds from this war that have plagued our Nation for so long, I ask unanimous consent that the speeches presented at that ceremony be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VIETNAM VETERANS MEMORIAL TRIBUTE

Mr. JAN SCRUGGS. My name is Jan Scruggs. I am here to certainly thank each and every one of you on behalf of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund and on behalf of the National Park Service for being with us on this very historic occasion.

For Vietnam Veterans and for America, this is a very special day. This is a time for remembrance and a time for healing the wounds of that war.

The ceremony will now begin with the posting of the colors and the Invocation by The Right Reverend John T. Walker.

Reverend Walker is the Episcopal Bishop of Washington, D.C. who made possible the vigil of names during the 1982 National Salute to Vietnam Veterans. He opened the doors of the National Cathedral to Vietnam veterans for a special ceremony of healing and remembrance.

Please post the colors.

The Right Reverend JOHN T. WALKER. Let us maintain silence for a moment. It is, I think, appropriate that we begin these ceremonies with prayer because the religions of this land and of the world that we all adhere to are concerned about reconciliation and the bringing of peoples together again. And so we pray to God for this.

Almighty God who has given us this good land for our heritage and has filled our lives with the desire for freedom and honor, bless all who are gathered here this day. You have bound us together in common life. You have helped us in our struggles for justice and truth at home. We thank you for men and women who have made this country strong, who have been clear models for us in our effort to remain true to the great promise of this nation. Though we have sometimes failed, yet, we do trust in your love to guide us back to that truth. Continue, O God, to help us that we may finish the task given into our hands. Forgive us those confrontations that have divided us into factions of hating and bitter people. Lead us, O Lord, into reconciliation and grant that from this day forward we may work together with mutual forbearance and respect. Save us from violence and discord and fashion anew this multitude from many places and tongues into a united people committed to justice and peace at home and abroad. All this we ask in your most Holy Name. Amen.

Mr. JAN SCRUGGS. Thank you. And a special thanks to the Marine Corps Band for that very stirring introduction.

Let's hear it for the Marine Corps Band. They've never let us down.

Welcoming remarks today will be delivered by Mr. John P. Wheeler, III. He is the Chairman of the Board of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund. He is a Vietnam Veteran and a graduate of West Point. He has sacrificed many thousands of hours as a volunteer for this project and he has also done a great deal of work in helping us all to understand the impact of Vietnam on veterans and on the Vietnam generation.

Ladies and Gentleman, John P. Wheeler, III.

Mr. JOHN P. WHEELER III. On behalf of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund, welcome to the dedication of this statue and to the ceremony where the Memorial Fund gives the Vietnam Veterans Memorial to the United States.

There are many myths about Vietnam. One is that Vietnam Veterans are losers; people to feel sorry for. It's not true. The truth is in the great contributions Vietnam veterans are making right now today in all the callings and professions of life. In fact, Vietnam Veterans all across America have kept giving to our country just like they did in a country far away over a decade ago.

They are earning trust and positions of great responsibility and authority in American life.

Another myth is that somehow our field commanders in Vietnam, the Colonels and Generals, let us down and have walked away from us unharmed by the war. It's not true. The greatest friends of the Memorial Fund have been men who first fought for our country in World War II. You see them with us on the podium. They will be speaking today.

The greatest myth is that Americans who did not wear the uniform were not deeply touched by the Vietnam War; that life went on pretty much as usual for most people back home without significant lasting effects. It's not true.

The events of the Vietnam era in Vietnam and at home deeply influenced the ideas and attitudes of all of us who lived through the period, especially the Vietnam generation, the millions of us who came of age then. Because of these formative effects, the Vietnam War is likely to have as much impact on American life in the next twenty years as in the last twenty.

This Memorial, the vigil at the Cathedral and the idealism and sense of introspection of so many Americans are signs that the final result of the Vietnam War can be healing that gives us new strength together.

The heart of the Memorial is names. Here are some names of people who we particularly thank today for their hand in building the Memorial: Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker, our great friend and counselor. He died at the end of this summer. His wife and our friend, Ambassador Carol Laise Bunker is with us.

Robert Dubek, in charge of all construction and planning. Our board: Sandy Mayo, Bob Frank, Richard Radez, John Morrison, Ron Gibbs and John Woods. Our fund raisers and managers: Bob Carter, Don Schaet, Sandy Fauriol, Karen Dubek and Kathie Kielich. And those who are speaking here today. Thank you. And thank you very much.

Mr. JAN SCRUGGS. Thank you very much, John.

Our first speaker today will be a very special friend of mine and a very special friend of Vietnam Veterans and certainly a special friend of this Memorial. A man who volunteered for both World War II and Korea.

In 1979, when I had this idea, I was able to get an appointment with a fellow who had just gotten himself a job as United States Senator from Virginia, a fellow named John Warner. And I told him about the idea, and he, having been former Secretary of the Navy, he thought this—maybe it would work and certainly if it could work, it could do a lot for our country and a lot for the veterans.

Senator Warner helped us raise the money for the Memorial. Senator Warner helped us resolve the many difficulties that have come in our way. I can't say enough good about this very very wonderful and distinguished man. Ladies and gentlemen, the distinguished Senator John Warner of Virginia.

Senator JOHN WARNER. Thank you Jan Scruggs and all gathered here today.

One is reminded on this afternoon of that brief refrain written about the turn of the century by Rudyard Kipling when he was addressing the life of a soldier. And that poem went, and he was speaking of a British Tommy:

For it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' "Chuck 'im out, the brute!"
But it's "Savior of 'is country" when the guns begin to shoot.

Ladies and gentleman, my brief message is that this statute, this great monument, will stand as an everlasting reminder to those who have the responsibility of the leadership of this nation, be that the President or the Congress, that never again shall America send forth its men and women in the cause of freedom to make those ultimate sacrifices unless this nation stands solidly behind those men and women—and unless this nation is prepared to receive them back with the honor, the dignity, and all the legal rights to which they are accorded.

When I think back over the many years that it was my privilege to work with Jan Scruggs and others—and all of the obstacles that were thrown in the path—and yet somehow we worked our way through, I shall always think that this statue is here today by act of divine providence. Thank you.

Mr. JAN SCRUGGS. Thank you very much, Senator Warner.

Our next speaker today is Retired Brigadier General George Price. General Price was wounded while fighting in the Korean War, stayed in the military and also fought in the Vietnam War. He was a career military officer, one of the first black officers to become Brigadier General and a very amazing and astounding man who has been a great friend of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, ladies and gentlemen, Brigadier General George Price.

Brigadier General GEORGE PRICE. Thank you Jan, Senator Warner, distinguished guests, fellow veterans, friends, parents, loved ones and families. I am deeply honored to participate in this tribute today because I understand our Commander in Chief is going to join us on this momentous occasion. And if I was in a position to render a report to our President, I would tell him, sir, it is with a great deal of gratitude that we bring home those Vietnam Veterans who served our country so nobly and with such distinction in a moment of crisis. That nine and a half million Americans answered our country's call, two and a half million served in Southeast Asia and they served with the same dignity and pride that has characterized his country's service members throughout our history. And we accomplished all of our missions, sir. We failed this country not one step. We never dropped the flag nor did we ever turn our back and we're delighted to make that report to you, sir.

We would also like to tell him that our mission and our convictions were never confused. We participated as one and we've collectivized our efforts behind one of our real heros, Jan Scruggs, whose sensitivity to the needs of his country carried on beyond the battlefields of Vietnam, but back home where it really was even more important.

His dream of this Memorial as a symbol of reconciliation, as a symbol of coming home, is among the most noble traditions of service this country has ever known. Jan is really one of our heros on and off the field of battle. And I think his staff and Jan deserves high praise.

To Maya Lin who transposed a thought and a dream into a reality in a fashion to memorialize those fifty seven odd thousand people who gave the supreme sacrifice. Her sensitivity as a young American certainly pays great tribute to the knowledge of what it is to live in this great country of ours. And I believe that Frederick Hart's sensitivity and the statue just adds to that tribute and makes all of us know that this entire two-acre plot belongs to all of us and we have an obligation to take away from here, from this place, on this day, our feelings to those who are less fortunate than ourselves, who because of reasons personal and economic and otherwise, will never see this Memorial except through our eyes. Take it home to them with a good feeling.

And I would tell our President that we were that which others did not want to be. We went where others feared to go and did what others failed to do. We asked nothing from those who gave nothing and reluctantly accepted the thought of eternal loneliness should we fail.

We have seen the face of terror. We have felt the stinging cold of fear and endured the sweet taste of a moment's love. We have cried, pained, hoped, but most of all, we have lived times others would say were best forgotten.

At least someday we will be able to say that we were proud of what we are—Vietnam Veterans, one and all.

It is very fitting that this day—or that we start with this day, our Memorial Day, because they have names on the Memorial Wall just as our male counterparts. And their service has been keeping with the highest tradition of our country and they deserve the great recognition that we hope this week will bring to them.

We share your anguish, we share your pain and we stand behind you in your week of recognition one hundred percent.

I believe we need to know that one of the philosophies and doctrines and practices of Vietnam was that we never leave our battlefield with any wounded or dead. And we cannot close this report to our Commander in Chief without saying that we hope that he will use all of the powers of his good offices to continue to search for those twenty five hundred Americans and bring their remains home.

Our hearts and our minds cannot rest in peace until we know. I believe also that the families of the veterans, and particularly Jan Scruggs and his family, deserve special recognition. It is no easy task to see your man go out on the venture where Jan Scruggs has and to pay those sacrifices which I'm sure his family paid, during the years that he was trying to realize a dream, and he now can see that dream fulfilled. I think they deserve the highest praise of anyone around and my compliments to you.

Some time ago, I made a comment from this platform that aptly described the feelings we had at the time from a poem by James Weldon Johnson. I think in 1984 I can give you another version of that poem that said:

God of our weary years
God of our silent tears
Thou who has brought us thus far on our way
Thou who has by thy might led us into the light
Keep us forever in the path we pray
Lest our feet stray from the places, O God, where we met Thee
Lest our hearts drunk with the wine of the world we forget Thee
Shattered beneath Thy hand
May we forever stand true to our God
True to our native land

Thank you very much.

Mr. JAN SCRUGGS. Thank you General.

Billy Ray Cameron is our next speaker. He is a native of North Carolina who saw heavy combat as a United States marine in Vietnam. He has always been involved with volunteer efforts to help veterans, to help his community. And he now holds a very great distinction of being the Commander in Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. The first Vietnam Veteran to hold this very distinguished position. Ladies and Gentlemen, Billy Ray Cameron.

Mr. BILLY RAY CAMERON. Thank you very much, Jan, for that kind introduction. And I'd like to say on behalf of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Jan, you and your staff a job well done. And it was a thrill to be here in 1982 and it's a thrill to be back again this year to dedicate this statue.

When I enlisted in the United States Marine Corps, the popular recruitment theme at that time was, the Marines are looking for a few good men. The unfortunate thing about the search for good men is that too many of the names on this Memorial, without doubt, represent the best of what America had. They were men who did not run away. They were willing to make the greatest sacrifice that any man or woman can make for their country. To give one's life to preserve the values that we Americans cherish so greatly, freedom and liberty.

This morning as I stood in Arlington Cemetery, I looked out at the thousands of headstones and thought about the service that American veterans have provided this great nation. Some veterans came home to enjoy the values that they fought to preserve. And some did not come home. Some came home to mighty celebrations and hearty welcomes, and some did not.

The men who fought America's wars are a very courageous group. But hardly a select group. Most of them are ordinary people, undistinguished from their neighbors until a day when the crisis of battle lifted them to the heights of valor. General of the Army Douglas MacArthur stated the heritage of the American fighting man very adequately when he said this about their accomplishments. I did not know the dignity of their burdens, but I do know the glory of their death.

To veterans, it's the constant reminder of the value that America places in freedom. A reminder of our blessings and the hard-fought bitter experience undertaken to protect our heritage. But we veterans have been more than soldiers. We have been human rightists, our compassions are reflected in thousands of civil actions, projects and other things that we served in other nations.

We built schools in other nations. We built hospitals. We held Christmas parties using food from our own daily rations and arranged for food and clothing to be sent from the United States to under-priviledged children and elderly persons in need. In our own country, we promoted the welfare of those less fortunate by assisting them through domestic actions and other programs. Not only in our military duties, but also in the voluntary capacities.

We in our veterans organization have helped millions of people abroad and at home. The American public, freedom loving citizens everywhere, have recognized our work and respect us for it.

Today, many veterans, particularly those from the Vietnam era, are themselves in need of help. For some, the problem has been making the transition from military to civilian life and forgetting about the war.

The Vietnam Veteran is of special concern to the Veterans of Foreign Wars. We know all the problems that they face: unemployment, the effects of Agent Orange, and often dismaying welcomes when they returned home to their friends and neighbors in Hometown, U.S.A.

This year, as your National Commander in Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, I personally make it my business to do all that I can to ease the unwarranted remarks and the unkind things said about those who served so greatly in Vietnam.

I would also ask all veterans to join me in recognizing the positive accomplishments of the hundreds of thousands of Vietnam Veterans today.

Today, this beautiful and inspiring statue is being installed as part of our National Veterans Salute. I pray that we use this event as a signal to end all remaining divisions among veterans. And from that, from this day on and the days forth, that we consider ourselves American veterans, one and all. Today would be a great day to start thinking about this.

Veterans Day is also the right time to remind you of the 2,489 of my comrades who are still missing in action. You know, they didn't have the opportunity to celebrate Veterans Day with us today in America. But to me, I feel personally, maybe some are still alive in the longest war that has ever been fought by these people that are missing in action.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars has a resolution to support President Reagan's pledge to keep the POW-MIA issue a matter of the highest national priority.

In closing, I ask you to remember that veterans have always been a source of pride to our great nation. We hope to exemplify the kind of dedication and sacrifice needed for safeguarding our great freedom. I ask your support for this cause of freedom also, not only on Veterans Day, but every day.

God bless you, and I ask you to remember, we, as veterans, stand for our God, our country and our flag. America is the greatest nation. Welcome home, my fellow Vietnam Veterans, men and women, for a job well done.

Thank you, Jan.

Mr. JAN SCRUGGS. Thank you, Commander Cameron.

Our next speaker today is Mr. Robert Turner, who is the Vice Commander of the American Legion. Mr. Turner is a native of Griffin, Georgia, who served in the Army during the Vietnam War and was formerly State Commander of the Georgia American Legion.

He was recently elected National Vice Commander of the great organization, the American Legion. Ladies and gentleman, Vice Commander Robert Turner.

Vice Commander ROBERT TURNER. Thank you, Jan, ladies and gentlemen.

It is with great pride that I come here today to represent National Commander Clarence Bacon and the 3½ million members of the American Legion and the American Legion Auxiliary.

On this day which is so important to this country, we honor those men and women of the United States who put duty, honor and country before self.

I'm especially pleased to participate in these ceremonies devoted to our most recent wartime veterans and to be able to share with you the tremendous emotional experience of seeing this powerful memorial completed by the addition of the sculpture to my left.

I, as have millions of other Americans who have been to this wall, have looked at the names of my friends and people from my home town there and reflect on those who served in Vietnam, those who returned, and those who did not.

I think about you fellow veterans, your strength and character as you withstood more than you deserved and I think about your dignity, your dedication and your patriotism.

Two years ago, when we gathered to dedicate the Memorial, we saw a great outpouring from the American people that showed their appreciation for your service and your sacrifice. For too long, you were led to believe that no one cared about the duty you performed so valiantly or about the battles you had to fight when you came home, but on that cold, damp day, there were signs that the wounds were beginning to heal.

Still, there were those who said that this Memorial was not enough. It was not heroic enough but that did not stop the construction and the eventual dedication of the Memorial. Instead it encouraged us to work together so that the monument would indeed be a rallying point to help the wounds heal and to help us unite again as a nation.

The differences surrounding the Memorial were worked out thoughtfully and, I think, appropriately, to include the statue that we're installing today.

You know, one of the great things about this country and our democratic tradition is that it recognizes differences and the value of discussions to resolve them. And today we recognize the people symbolized by the sculpture and those named on the wall who fought to preseve that tradition.

The statue of the three servicemen ties together the memories of the living and the dead and unifies the whole. The Vietnam Veterans Memorial to those who died in Vietnam for it has touched every American just as it has touched every American citizen.

From this day forward, the United States Park Service will manage the Memorial and that is a victory for all of us. It is fitting that the Nation be the custodian of this site, to preserve and protect it as the men and women we honor today preserved and protected the nation through their service.

This Memorial represents a part of our national history we cannot afford to forget. Neither can we afford to forget the members of the armed forces who, because of their convictions, served their country when they were needed most. They deserve our respect. They deserve our devotion. They earned their Memorial.

Last night near this place, I was fortunate to witness a moving and dignified service for nearly twenty five hundred courageous Americans whose names are on this Memorial but whose fates remain a mystery to all of us. To the families and friends of those still missing and unaccounted for, I say that we have not forgotten them and we have not forgotten you. Your strength, courage and conviction inspire all of us to work harder on the POW-MIA issue and we will not rest until it is resolved.

On this day of national salute to Veterans, I salute you.

Thank you.

Mr. JAN SCRUGGS. (Transcript not available—introduced the Honorable David E. Bonior, U.S. Congressman, 12th District, Michigan.)

Hon. DAVID E. BONIOR. For over 200 years, this nation revered its warriors who joined battle against those who sought through force to alter our chosen way of life.

Today, places like Yorktown and Omaha Beach are objects of pilgrimage for those who never experienced their glory, yet feel a sense of intangible gratitude to those who did.

The soldiers of the Vietnam War met our nation's highest standard of service. The house-to-house battles for Hue, the murderous shellings absorbed at Khe Sahn, tested the courage of our soliders no less than the battles of World War II and Korea.

Yet, if the courage was the same, the war was not. It was hard to separate the warrior from the debate over the Vietnam War and the nations was slow to recognize our Vietnam Veterans. But, today we add this Memorial to our nation's proud monuments.

Last Sunday, I was in Mount Sterling, Kentucky, at the dedication of the Montgomery County Vietnam Memorial. In my own state of Michigan, planning is underway for a memorial in Westland. And these are just signs of a tide that are sweeping across this great land of ours.

Vietnam veterans came from small towns and ghettos, from steel mills and farms. Their story is America's story; the story of the last two decades of our history. Yes, it is the tragic story of a nation that forgot its veterans, but it is also the proud story of veterans that would not be pushed aside and of a nation that was at last prepared to listen.

You can see that story on the faces of thousands of people who visit this Memorial each day. Some are veterans seeking out the names of lost comrades, some are fathers and mothers, wives and brothers, sisters and friends. Most are just Americans who regret the years of neglect and welcome the opportunity to remember. As we honor the value of service to country that is the duty of citizenship; so we are proud of those who fight and die in the country's name. But those who wander by this place, pause to look at this statue, to read from these names, and to remember—to remember the courage of those who served and the sorrow of a nation that turned away. But let them also remember that despite the years of delay, we came together as one people to honor our dead, to praise the living, and to plant this Memorial forever in the memory of our people. I am deeply honored to have had this opportunity to be with you today.

Mr. JAN SCRUGGS. Thank you very much, Congressman.

Our next speaker today is a very special man. Francis Whitebird served as a combat medic in Vietnam with the 196th Light Infantry Brigade. He is a Sioux Indian who has been very active in Indian Affairs and civil rights. He is a graduate of Harvard, yet is a traditionalist who practices and believes strongly in the Sioux Tribe's traditional religion.

We are very honored to have with us a very distinguished American, a graduate of Harvard and a very wonderful person, ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Francis Whitebird.

Mr. FRANCIS WHITEBIRD. Thank you, Jan.

I'm going to pray with my pipe.

Grandfather, the Great Spirit from the Spirit Land, you who have taken and protected all of the spirits before us from the Vietnam War, hear our weak voice in the strong wind so that you may hear our thoughts. And Grandfather, Great Spirit of the West, the land of the thunderbeings, look in our direction, we stand before you, humble and pitiful as we have traveled a road of troubles and war for the last two decades. Our shoulders and our minds have carried the blame of war and all the effects of it.

Grandfather, give us some of the Bison spirit so that we may start to collect as a group and start to move in one direction, towards the wind, that we may not have to seek shelter against the storm of ridicule and criticism. And Grandfather, Great Spirit of the North, home of the snow goose, look in our direction. We stand before you, our thoughts weak and impure with narrow mindedness. Give us your cleansing breath so that our thoughts and our bodies will be purified so we may enjoy respect for ourselves, respect for others, and enjoy the feeling of truth and honesty and to be relatives again.

Grandfather, Great Spirit of the East, home of the daybreak star, look in our direction. We stand before you without guidance within ourselves and we do not have any direction for the past two decades. Grandfather, give us direction as a nation so we may have the strength in our ideas and have a clear vision of duty and honor to our country, now and in the future. And Grandfather, Great Spirit of the South, home of the summer, look in our direction. We stand before you tired and unhappy, our thoughts dried and blowing in the winds, and we have just endured a hard winter of our lives.

Grandfather, give us the breath, the spring of life, so that we may enjoy the warmth of life and grow with the grace and beauty in our lives and as a nation all of whom may be within a sacred life. And Grandfather, the Eagle Spirit of the skies, look down, look upon us as our thoughts and our spirits are very low flying below the tree tops so that we do not see beyond the next minute, the next hill. Grandfather, lift our thoughts and our minds so that we may work towards high ideals and high goals within ourselves as a nation.

And Grandmother Earth, the Giver of Life, we ask for your help as we have stopped growing within ourselves and as a nation. Grandmother Earth, restore our lives so that we may live happy and productive lives, live in the warmth of your home, be pure in thought, possess a clear vision and live in the harmony with everything within a sacred circle of life with all our relatives.

Thank you.

Mr. JAN SCRUGGS. My fellow veterans, because of this Memorial, we do now have our recognition. And we can now say that we have honored our dead and all of this has been a long time in coming. But it's a time for America to be proud again.

This Memorial has given America far more than honor for its veterans. Out of the bitter devisiveness of Vietnam has come a symbol of national unity. This is a memorial to heal the wounds of the Veterans and to heal the wounds of a nation.

People will always debate the Vietnam War, and let them. But this site is sacred ground where Americans have shown their honor and their respect for the sacrifices made by generations of young soldiers who answered the call of duty.

Before we turn this Memorial over to the government, I have something to say. It is indeed ironic that Vietnam Veterans are giving the government a Memorial. It would seem more appropriate for the government to be giving a memorial to the Vietnam Veterans. But Vietnam was that kind of war.

We Vietnam Veterans, in the same spirit that we served in that conflict, now prepare to give America something very wonderful. We give our country this Memorial. We give our country back its pride. We give our country back its unity, both of which were wounded so badly by that war.

Today, we also thank those who made this Memorial possible. The funds for this Memorial came from the people of this country, they came from locals of the AFL-CIO, the Teamsters Union, Veterans' Posts, high school students, elementary school children. People who were against the war donated and conservative businessmen. Every type of person in America is a part of this Memorial.

From across America, when the idea for this Memorial came out, compassionate people responded to our need for funding. As a Vietnam Veteran, I have to say, thank you, America.

Yet, there is more work to be done. We must have a full accounting for those who are missing in action.

We must resolve the Agent Orange controversy. We must be assured that those who make the foreign policy decisions for our country remember the lessons learned in Vietnam. And we as veterans must never let another generation of returning war veterans, if that happens, get the reception that we received after our military service.

For me, personally, the project has probably been the most challenging and difficult thing that I have ever done in my life, but I have had a lot of help. I've had a very talented staff with people such as Colonel Robert A. Carter, a retired fighter pilot who served in Vietnam, flew over 100 missions, and who has managed the Memorial Fund. I've met others like Bob Dubek, Colonel Don Shaet, Kathie Kielich, and many others who put in countless hours on this project, and people on our Board of Directors who have served as volunteers and done so very much to help the project move along.

Recognition is also due another very, very special person. I and all Vietnam veterans thank Miss Maya Yin Lin.

She gave us her talent at designing this beautiful wall that has been a catharsis for so many of us and so many of the parents whose sons are on that wall. And to Frederick Hart, the sculptor, for this extraordinary work of art that we dedicate here today for his great work.

And we recognize General Michael S. Davidson who came with the idea to include a statue to the Vietnam Memorial, and we give our very special thanks to the National Park Service and to the people who actually literally built the Memorial, the construction workers, people like Joe Mussolino, the Gilbane Building Company, the architecture firm of Cooper Lecky, and many others.

People in the National Park Service have been particularly helpful with the ceremonies and everything concerning the Vietnam Veterans Memorial. We are thankful to them as public servants. If you were to see the work that they do and have done for us, you would be very pleased, you're getting your money's worth with the United States Park Service.

There is a hand for the Park Service.

Ladies and gentlemen, I would like to now introduce the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. William P. Clark—the Honorable William P. Clark. He's had a very distinguished career of public service as a judge and recently served two years as Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs. He is the 44th Secretary of Interior of our Government, but he is the only one to ever get a Vietnam Veterans Memorial. So, ladies and gentlemen, the Honorable Secretary of the Interior, William P. Clark.

Hon. WILLIAM P. CLARK. Ladies and gentlemen, standing here this Veterans Day, together, among the great monuments of America's history, I am reminded of the words that Abraham Lincoln spoke at Gettysburg in the midst of our most bitter war, words that are chiseled in stone in the monument to our right. His speech was brief, as mine will be this moment, but President Lincoln spoke long enough to remind the people gathered together on that battlefield that they could not dedicate that ground, they could not consecrate that ground, they could not hallow that ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, he said, have consecrated it. Far above our poor power to add or to detract. He went on, it is for us the living to be dedicated here to the unfinished work that they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us that from these honored dead, we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion, that we here highly resolve that these dead should not have died in vain.

Today, unlike Mr. Lincoln at Gettysburg, we cannot meet on the battlefields of Vietnam, we cannot gather in the rice paddies and the jungles of a far away land to honor those who served so courageously and honorably in that our longest and most painful war since the Civil War.

So, we come together here instead, amidst the most enduring symbols of our history as a nation. We come together to add yet one more monument to this most noble setting. And in doing so we say, as Lincoln said at Gettysburg, that this ground is now sacred. We do not make it so. The 58,022 men and women whose names here are enshrined have consecrated it far above our own poor power, again, to add or to detract.

But we pledge them that we will not allow their sacrifice again to be in vain. We dedicate ourselves anew to the cause of freedom for which they gave their lives. We dedicate ourselves again to the task of assuring that America that they left us will ever be the land of the free, the home of the brave, and in so doing, we also honor those who serve, but whose fate remains unknown, those who have still not returned. As president Reagan said last Memorial Day at the funeral of the Unknown Serviceman of the Vietnam Conflict, and I quote: "An end to America's involvement in Vietnam cannot come before we have achieved the fullest possible accounting of those missing in action."

And, yes, their names are also inscribed on this Memorial. We honor the families of those who have served, and especially the families of those who are still missing. But, they still bear the personal sorrows of war and its uncertainty.

We honor their comrades, so many of whom have come from across America to be here with us this day. This Memorial is for you, you have served your country so well. And, thus, ladies and gentlemen, I'll now join the President who will join you with the First Lady very shortly.

Thank you and God bless.

Senator JOHN W. WARNER. Ladies and gentlemen, the President of the United States and Mrs. Reagan, accompanied by Secretary Clark.

Men and women of the Armed Forces of the United States, veterans who served America with pride, it is my privilege to present to you the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States, the President of the United States.

President REAGAN. Thank you very much.

Thank you. Thank you. Senator Warner, thank you very much and may I thank you also for the crucial personal support that you gave to the building of this Memorial. I extend the thanks of the Nation also to all who have contributed so much to this fine cause.

Ladies and gentlemen, honored guests, my remarks today will be brief because so much has been said over the years and said so well about the loyalty and the valor of those who served us in Vietnam.

It's occurred to me that only one very important thing has been left unsaid, and I will try to speak of it today. It is almost 10 years now since U.S. military involvement in Vietnam came to a close.

Two years ago, our Government dedicated the Memorial bearing the names of those who died or are still missing. Every day the families and friends of those men and women come to the wall and search out a name and touch it. The Memorial reflects as a mirror reflects, so that when you find a name you're searching for, you find it in your own reflection. And as you touch it from certain angles, you are touching too the reflection of the Washington Monument or the chair in which great Abe Lincoln sits.

Those who fought in Vietnam are part of us, part of our history. They reflected the best in us. No number of wreaths, no amount of music and memorializing will ever do them justice, but it is good for us that we honor them and their sacrifice. And it's good that we do it in the reflected glow of the enduring symbols of our republic.

The fighting men depicted in the statue we dedicate today, the three young American servicemen are individual only in terms of their battle dress. All are as one, with eyes fixed upon the Memorial, bearing the names of their brother in arms.

On their youthful faces, faces too young to have experienced war, we see expressions of loneliness and profound love and a fierce determination never to forget. The men of Vietnam answered the call of their country. Some of them died in the arms of many of you here today, asking you to look after a newly born child or care for a loved one. They died uncomplaining, the tears staining their mud caked faces were not for self-pity, but for the sorrow that they knew the news of their death would cause their families and friends.

As you knelt along side his litter and held him one last time, you heard his silent message. He asked you not to forget. Today we pay homage not only to those who gave their lives, but of their comrades present today and all across the country. You didn't forget. You kept the faith. You walked away from the litter, wiped away your tears and returned to battle. You fought on, sustained by one another, and deaf to the voices of those who didn't comprehend. You performed with a steadfastness and valor that veterans of other wars salute, and you are forever in the ranks of that special number of Americans in every generation that the nation records as true patriots.

Also among the service men and women honored here today is a unique group of Americans whose fate is still unknown to our nation and to their families. Nearly twenty five hundred of the names on this memorial are still missing in Southeast Asia and some may still be serving. Their names are distinguished by a cross rather than a diamond. Thus, this Memorial is a symbol of both past and current sacrifice.

The war in Vietnam threatened to tear our society apart and the political and philosophical disagreements that animated each side continue to some extent. It's been said that these memorials reflect a hunger for healing. Well, I do not know if perfect healing ever occurs, but I know that sometimes when a bone is broken, if it's knit together well, it will in the end be stronger than if it had not been broken.

I believe that in the decade since Vietnam, the healing has begun and I hope that before my days as Commander in Chief are over, the process will be completed.

There were great moral and philosophical disagreements about the rightness of the war and we cannot forget them because there is no wisdom to be gained in forgetting. But we can forgive each other and ourselves for those things that we now recognize may have been wrong, and I think it's time we did.

There has been much rethinking by those who did not serve and those who did. There has been much rethinking by those who held strong views on the war and by those who did not know which view was right. There has been rethinking on all sides and this is good. And it's time we moved on in unity and with resolve—with a resolve to always stand for freedom as those who fought did and to always try to protect and preserve the peace.

And we must in unity work to account for those still missing and aid those returned who still suffer from the pain and memory of Vietnam.

We must, as a society, take guidance from the fighting men memorialized by this statute. The three servicemen are watchful, ready and challenged, but they are also standing forever. And let me say to the Vietnam veterans gathered here today, when you returned home, you brought solace to the loved ones of those who fell, but little solace was given—given to you. Some of your countrymen were unable to distinguish between our native distaste for war and the stainless patriotism of those who suffered its scars. But there has been a rethinking there, too. And now we can say to you, and say as a nation, thank you for your courage. Thank you for being patient with your countrymen.

Thank you. Thank you. Thank you for continuing to stand with us together.

The men and women of Vietnam fought for freedom in a place where liberty was endangered. They put their lives in danger to help a people in a land far away from their own. Many sacrificed their lives in the name of duty, honor and country. All were patriots who lit the world with their fidelity and courage. They were both our children and our heros. We will never ever forget them. We will never forget their devotion and their sacrifice. They stand before us marching into time and into shared memory forever. May God bless their souls.

Now, I shall sign the document by which this Memorial has been gratefully received by our Government.

(President Reagan then signed the document which accepted the Memorial as a part of the United States Government's system of National Parks.)

OPPOSING FULL FUNDING FOR STAR WARS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, in the weeks ahead the Congress will address the important question of extending the current moratorium on testing of antisatellite weapons.

The debate on ASAT testing will be the first of many I believe we will hold this Congress on the whole issue of star wars and the appropriate level of funding for the President's strategic defense initiative.

I recently addressed this issue both in a statement made to the press in San Francisco and in a Washington press conference convened by the California Democratic delegation.

After the meeting of the California delegation, Representative GEORGE BROWN presented a statement on these issues to which I subscribe fully. I ask unanimous consent that these two statements be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR ALAN CRANSTON

I oppose the testing and deployment of "Star Wars".

I agree with Paul C. Warnke that "the testing and deployment of such systems would be fatal to prospects of controlling and reducing strategic nuclear warheads."

The Soviet response to deployment would be not only to build their own system, but to build more missiles, bombers and cruises to saturate and overcome our defenses. Thus we and they would extend the arms race into space creating new dangers and costing us alone more than $1 trillion.

I also believe that the United States should extend the moratorium against testing of U.S. anti-satellite (ASAT) weapons. The present moratorium established by Congress expires on March 1.

I am a strong advocate of arms control, arms limitations and arms reductions.

But not if is unilateral.

And not if it is unverifiable.

A halt of all U.S. research on anti-missile defense would be unilateral the Soviet Union is conducting research on a strategic defense initiative of its own.

And a mutual agreement to halt research would be unverifiable. There is no way we could verify that Soviet research has ended unless we check every laboratory and classroom look into the minds of every student and scientist in the Soviet Union.

Therefore I have supported, and now support, a modest program of research.

I know of no member of Congress who is opposed to research. My position is identical to that of Congressman George Brown, the leader of the entire California House delegation on this issue, who supports limited, prudent research, but who will work for cuts in the massive spending proposed by the Reagan administration.

I agree, too, with Warnke, who stated on January 18, "Advanced research can be justified to explore the frontiers of technology and to ensure that we are not presented with a rude Soviet surprise in the future."

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

Good morning and welcome. As Members of the California Democratic Delegation, we are seeking to develop a House position on the issue of space weapons—in particular the President's Strategic Defense Initiative and the Anti-satellite weapon—and to encourage support for U.S. civilian space programs which have played an important role in California's economy.

There are three questions which will dominate the debate over Star Wars—the President's hope of rendering nuclear weapons "impotent and obsolete" by calling for the deployment of exotic weapons in space. The first is, can we afford it? Congress has already expressed skepticism about this by cutting the President's fiscal year '85 request for the Strategic Defense Initiative by almost 25 percent. And there will be even greater pressure to cut this program in fiscal year '86 with deficits projected at over $200 billion.

As most of you know, the President's Strategic Defense Initiative research program alone is expected to cost about $25 billion over the next five years, if Congress approves it. The ASAT program would add another $3 to $12 billion over the same period. A fully-deployed ballistic-missile defense program, by many estimates, would cost between half a trillion and a trillion dollars, at least. Put another way, it would add $50 billion per year to the defense budget for ten to twenty years.

Secretary Weinberger also indicates that a $50 billion continental defense system would be required to counter a new Soviet emphasis on manned bombers and cruise missiles if they think our SDI might be effective. This kind of spending would create a drain not only on domestic programs, but on defense programs as well. I know that many of our Republican colleagues will join us in taking a close look at the spending request for Star Wars as well.

The second question is, would Star Wars serve national security? The prospect of U.S. deployment of a space-based BMD system designed to threaten the effectiveness of Soviet missile forces is tantamount to inviting an open-ended buildup of nuclear weapons. This is because the first, and simplest response to a BMD system, is to build more missiles that will saturate, and overcome, the defense. A second response would be to build more intercontinental bombers and cruise missiles. A strategic defense system would therefore fuel the nuclear arms race, in addition to launching a totally new arms race in space.

Finally, how will arms control and the upcoming "umbrella talks" be effected? First, I should say that I commend and support the President for his renewed arms control efforts, and for agreeing to these talks. My colleagues and I will lend our support where we can.

Although the President has stated that the Star Wars, or the SDI research program, is strictly a research program, not a testing or development program, activities which are prohibited by the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, the possibility of future deployment of potentially effective systems, and the abrogation of the ABM Treaty, have a chilling effect on any effort at new arms control agreements.

As a gesture of good faith in the importance and need for these negotiations, we urge the President to extend the moratorium against testing of the U.S. anti-satellite (ASAT) weapon beyond March 1, 1985, the date of expiration of the moratorium set by Congress. The California Democratic Delegation was virtually unanimous in its support of my amendment to the FY'85 Defense Authorization bill last year establishing a one year ASAT test moratorium. We believe that this moratorium has been a factor in the return of the Soviet Union to the negotiating table, and that it provides important bargaining leverage in the impending negotiations.

Finally, and I can't speak for all of my colleagues here, I am a bonafide space enthusiast. My guess is that most of my colleagues are too. I have long believed that we should be building a space station as our next logical step into space. I also believe that we ought to return to the moon and consider a manned mission to Mars. We should provide adequate support for scientific research in space, and should be exploiting the economic and commercial potential of space. In fact, most of my colleagues also support the military uses of space, where that use contributes to global stability and security, including the use of military satellites for communications, reconaissance, and early warning.

The U.S. is the world leader in the use of space for scientific and economic progress. This leadership will be threatened if we continue with programs which minimize the civilian scientific and commercial development of space, in favor of a massive program of weaponization of space. Such action diverts manpower and resources from our real needs in space, as it is doing on earth, and creates a chilling effect on private investment in space for commercial and industrial purposes. It reflects a direct repudiation of the vision of President Eisenhower and all subsequent Presidents, who have called for the peaceful uses of space for the benefit of all mankind.

Thank you. I would be happy to take questions.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, seeing no other Member seeking recognition, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. WALLOP]. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STAR PRINT OF S. 372

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 372 be star printed to reflect typographical corrections, and that the bill, as corrected, be printed in the RECORD. I send the corrected version to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) this Act may be referred to as the "Federal Coal Leasing Amendments Act of 1985".

(b) Except as otherwise expressly provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to or repeal of, a section or other provision of the Mineral Lands Leasing Act, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Act of February 25, 1920, entitled "An Act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain" (41 Stat. 437).

SEC. 2. Section 2(a)(2) of the Mineral Lands Leasing Act (30 U.S.C. 201(a)(2)) is amended by deleting subparagraph (A) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(A)(i) The Secretary shall not issue a lease or leases to coal deposits under the terms of this section to any person, association, corporation, or any subsidiary, affiliate, or persons controlled by or under common control with such person, association, or corporation, where any such entity holds a lease or leases issued prior to August 4, 1976, by the United States to coal deposits and has held such lease or leases for a period of ten years when such entity is not, except as provided in section 7(b) of this Act, producing coal from the leased deposits in commercial quantities. In computing the ten-year period referred to in the preceding sentence, periods of time prior to August 4, 1976 shall not be counted.

"(ii) The prohibition in subparagraph (A)(i) shall not apply if such entity agrees to relinquish a noncompliance coal lease or leases issued pursuant to this Act containing estimated recoverable coal reserves equivalent to the estimated recoverable coal reserves from the lease or leases being issued. To the extent coal reserves relinquished under this subparagraph exceed the coal reserves to be acquired, the entity with the approval of the Secretary may, for the purposes of complying with this section, apply the amount of excess reserves toward future competitive lease sales.

"(iii) The prohibition in subparagraph (A)(i) shall not apply if such entity holds no more than two noncompliance leases issued prior to August 4, 1976, and pays an additional rental on those coal deposits being acquired.

"(iv) For the purposes of this section, the term 'noncompliance lease' means a coal lease issued prior to August 4, 1976, which has been held by the lessee for a period of ten years and has not produced coal from the lease deposits in commercial quantities. The number of acres on which the fee is assessed shall not exceed the number of acres within the noncompliance lease held by the lessee.

"(v) The additional rental set forth in subparagraph (A)(iii) shall be assessed on the following basis:

"(I) an entity acquiring a coal lease with estimated recoverable reserves of coal up to one hundred million tons would pay an additional rental of $25 per acre for such lease;

"(II) an entity acquiring a coal lease with estimated recoverable reserves of coal of one hundred million tons or more but less than three hundred million tons would pay an additional rental of $35 per acre for such lease; and

"(III) an entity acquiring a coal lease with estimated recoverable reserves of coal of over three hundred million tons would pay an additional rental of $45 per acre for such lease.

"(iv) Estimations of acreage or recoverable reserves necessary to determine the terms of relinquishment or the rental assessed under subparagraph (A)(v) shall be based on the Secretary's estimate of recoverable coal reserves without regard to quality or location.

"(vii) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Secretary shall accept the relinquishment by the lessee of any coal lease or leases issued prior to August 4, 1976, where there has not been significant surface disturbance pursuant to a permit issued under section 506 of the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 (30 U.S.C. 1256).

"(viii) The prohibition on the Secretary issuing coal leases under subparagraph (A)(i) shall not apply to an entity that has met the conditions set forth under subparagraphs (A)(ii) or (A)(iii) or (A)(vii) regarding the relinquishment of noncompliance coal leases, the payment of an additional rental, or the relinquishment of leases issued prior to August 4, 1976.

SEC. 3. (a) Section 7 of the Mineral Lands Leasing Act (30 U.S.C. 207) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. (a) A coal lease shall be for a term of twenty years and for so long thereafter as the condition of continued operation is met. The Secretary shall by regulation prescribe annual rentals on leases. A lease shall require payment of a royalty in such amount as the Secretary shall determine of not less than 12.5 per centum of the value of coal as defined by regulation, except the Secretary may determine a lesser amount in the case of coal recovered by underground mining operations. The lease shall include such other terms and conditions as the Secretary shall determine. Such rentals and royalties and other terms and conditions of the lease will be subject to readjustment at the end of its primary term of twenty years and at the end of each ten-year period thereafter if the lease is extended. With respect to a lease issued prior to August 4, 1976, upon the effective date of the first readjustment after the date of enactment of the Federal Coal Leasing Amendments Act of 1985, the amount of the royalty required to be paid under such lease shall be readjusted automatically by operation of law to a rate of not less than 12.5 per centum of the value of coal for surface mined coal, and to a rate of not less than 8 per centum in the case of coal recovered by underground mining operations.

"(b)(1) A lease that is not producing coal in commercial quantities at the end of ten years shall be terminated unless the lessee chooses to extend the lease beyond the tenth lease year through the payment of advance royalties.

"(2) Such advance royalties shall be no less than the production royalty which would otherwise be paid and shall be assessed on an escalating basis as follows:

"(A) in the eleventh lease year, an advance royalty would be assessed on assumed production of 0.1 per centum of total recoverable reserves;

"(B) in the twelfth lease year, an advance royalty would be assessed on assumed production of 0.2 per centum of total recoverable reserves;

"(C) in the thirteenth lease year, an advance royalty would be assessed on assumed production of 0.3 per centum of total recoverable reserves;

"(D) in the fourteenth lease year, an advance royalty would be assessed on assumed production of 0.4 per centum of total recoverable reserves;

"(E) in the fifteenth lease year, an advance royalty would be assessed on assumed production of 0.5 per centum of total recoverable reserves;

"(F) in the sixteenth lease year, an advance royalty would be assessed on assumed production of 0.6 per centum of total recoverable reserves;

"(G) in the seventeenth lease year, an advance royalty would be assessed on assumed production of 0.7 per centum of total recoverable reserves;

"(H) in the eighteenth lease year, an advance royalty would be assessed on assumed production of 0.8 per centum of total recoverable reserves;

"(I) in the nineteenth lease year, an advance royalty would be assessed on assumed production of 0.9 per centum of total recoverable reserves; and

"(J) in the twentieth lease year, an advance royalty would be assessed on assumed production of 1 per centum of total recoverable reserves.

"(3) Payment by a lessee of advance royalties under subsection (b) of this section shall constitute compliance with Section 2(a)(2)(A) of the Mineral Lands Leasing Act (30 U.S.C. 201(a)(2)(A)).

"(4) The payment of any advance royalty by the lessee for any year in which production of lease reserves exceeds commercial quantities, as this term is defined in section 7(e) of this Act, may be credited against production, to the extent that such production exceeds commercial quantities.

"(c) Each lease shall be subject to the conditions of diligent development and continued operation of the mine or mines, except where operations under the lease are interrupted by strikes, the elements, or casualties not attributable to the lessee. The Secretary of the Interior, upon determining that the public interest will be served thereby, may suspend the condition of continued operation upon the payment of advance royalties. Such advance royalties shall be no less than the production royalty which would otherwise be paid and shall be computed on a fixed reserve to production ratio (determined by the Secretary). The aggregate number of years during the period of any lease for which advance royalties may be accepted in lieu of the condition of continued operation shall not exceed ten. The amount of any production royalty paid to suspend the condition of continued operation for any year shall be reduced (but not below zero) by the amount of any advance royalties paid under such lease to the extent that such advance royalties have not been used to reduce production royalties for a prior year. No advance royalty paid during the initial twenty-year term of a lease shall be used to reduce a production royalty after the twentieth year of a lease. The Secretary may, upon six months' notification to the lessee cease to accept advance royalties in lieu of the requirement of continued operation. Nothing in this subsection, with the exception of payment of advance royalties in lieu of production, shall be construed to affect the requirement contained in subsection (b)(1) relating to commencement of production at the end of ten years.

"(d) Prior to taking any action on a leasehold which might cause a significant disturbance of the environment, the lessee shall submit for the Secretary's approval an operation and reclamation plan. The Secretary shall approve or disapprove the plan or require that it be modified. Where the land involved is under the surface jurisdiction of another Federal agency, that other agency must consent to the terms of such approval.

"(e) For the purposes of this Act, with respect to leases issued to coal deposits or readjusted after the date of enactment of the Federal Coal Leasing Amendments Act of 1985, the term—

"(1) 'commercial quantities' means one per centum of the recoverable coal reserves under lease or within a logical mining unit (LMU);

"(2) 'diligent development' means the production of recoverable coal reserves in commercial quantities;

"(3) 'continued operation' means the production of not less than commercial quantities of recoverable coal reserves in each year following the achievement of diligent development and an average amount of not less than commercial quantities of recoverable reserves each year therafter, computed on a three-year basis consisting of the year in question and the two preceeding years.".

SEC. 4. Section 2(a)(1) of the Mineral Lands Leasing Act (30 U.S.C. 201(a)) is amended by inserting after the first sentence, the following: "For purposes of this subsection, the term 'competitive bidding' shall mean the receipt of bids by two or more bidders, with the exception of bidding for a maintenance or bypass lease as defined in regulation.".

SEC. 5. Section 2 of the Mineral Lands Leasing Act (30 U.S.C. 201(a)) is amended by inserting the following new subsections and renumbering thereafter, accordingly:

"(a)(3) The Secretary shall promulgate rules and regulations to provide for experimentation with the negotiated sale of leases for bypass and maintenance tracts as defined by the Secretary. Such rules and regulations as are necessary shall be published in the Federal Register within six months after the date of enactment of the Federal Coal Leasing Amendments Act of 1985.

"(4)(A) Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, neither the Secretary nor any other officer, employee, contractor or agent of the Department of the Interior or bureau or agency thereof, shall disclose to anyone who is not an employee, contractor or agent of the Department of the Interior or bureau or agency any data developed by the Department of the Interior for estimating coal tract value.

"(B) Any Federal employee, contractor or agent of the Department, including the Secretary, who willfully violates subsection (a)(4)(A) shall be guilty of a crime and subject to the penalties set forth in section 1905 of title 18, United States Code.".

SEC. 6. The Mineral Lands Leasing Act (30 U.S.C. 208-2) is amended by adding after section 8B the following new section 8C:

"SEC. 8C. The Comptroller General of the General Accounting Office shall monitor the management, supervision, and enforcement relating to the leasing and production of coal on coal lands subject to this Act for a period of five years after the date of enactment of the Federal Coal Leasing Amendments Act of 1985, and shall report his findings with respect to these activities in a semiannual report to the Congress beginning six months after the date of enactment of the Federal Coal Leasing Amendments Act of 1985.".

SEC. 7. Section 30 of the Mineral Lands Leasing Act (30 U.S.C. 187) is amended by inserting after the first sentence thereof the following: "Within one hundred and eighty days of enactment of the Federal Coal Leasing Amendments Act of 1985, the Secretary of the Interior shall promulgate regulations which require, prior to this approval of any transfer of a record title interest or assignment of operating rights in a lease, that the transferor submit to the Secretary of the Interior a financial document describing the consideration or value paid or promised for the transfer. Such regulations shall set forth both the extent and type of the information required to be filed in such financial document.".

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE RECESS

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1985, the Secretary of the Senate, on February 4, 1985, during the recess of the Senate, received messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations; which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received on February 4, 1985, are printed at the end of Senate proceedings.)

REPORT ON SOVIET ARMS CONTROL COMPLIANCE—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE RECESS—PM 12

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1985, the Secretary of the Senate, on February 1, 1985, during the recess of the Senate, received the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

During 1984, at the request of the Congress, I forwarded two reports to the Congress on arms control compliance. The first, forwarded last January, was an in-depth analysis of seven specific issues of violations or probable violations by the Soviet Union of arms control obligations and commitments. The second report, forwarded in October, was an advisory study prepared independently by the General Advisory Committee on Arms Control and Disarmament. These reports indicate that there is cause for serious concern regarding the Soviet Union's conduct with respect to observance of arms control agreements.

In the FY-1985 Defense Authorization Act and the Conference Report on that Act, the Congress called for additional classified and unclassified reports regarding a wide range of questions concerning the Soviet Union's compliance with arms control commitments. The Administration is responding to these requests by providing both classified and unclassified reports which update the seven issues initially analyzed in the January 1984 report, and analyze a number of additional issues.

In this unclassified report the United States Government reaffirms the conclusions of its January 1984 report that the USSR has violated the Helsinki Final Act, the Geneva Protocol on Chemical Weapons, the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention, and two provisions of SALT II: telemetry encryption and ICBM modernization. The United States Government also reaffirms its previous conclusions that the USSR has probably violated the SS-16 deployment prohibition of SALT II and is likely to have violated the nuclear testing yield limit of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty. In addition, the United States Government has determined that the USSR has violated the ABM Treaty (through the siting, orientation and capability of the Krasnoyarsk Radar), violated the Limited Test Ban Treaty, and violated the SALT II provision prohibiting more than one new type of ICBM, and probably violated the ABM Treaty restriction on concurrent testing of SAM and ABM components. Evidence regarding the USSR's compliance with the ABM Treaty provision on component mobility was determined to be ambiguous. In addition, the United States Government is concerned about Soviet preparations for a prohibited territorial ABM defense. Further, the USSR was determined to be currently in compliance with those provisions of the SALT I Interim Agreement and its implementing procedures that deal with reuse of dismantled ICBM sites and with the reconfiguration of dismantled ballistic missile launching submarines.

Beyond the issues that are treated in the unclassified report released today, there are other compliance issues that will not be publicly disclosed at this time but which remain under review. As we continue to work on these issues, we will brief and consult with the Congress in detail and will, to the maximum extent possible, keep the public informed on our findings.

In order for arms control to have meaning and credibly contribute to national security and to global or regional stability, it is essential that all parties to agreements fully comply with them. Strict compliance with all provisions of arms control agreements is fundamental, and this Administration will not accept anything less. To do so would undermine the arms control process and damage the chances for establishing a more constructive US-Soviet relationship.

As I stated last January, Soviet noncompliance is a serious matter. It calls into question important security benefits from arms control, and could create new security risks. It undermines the confidence essential to an effective arms control process in the future. With regard to the issues analyzed in the January 1984 report, the Soviet Union has thus far not provided satisfactory explanations nor undertaken corrective actions sufficient to alleviate our concerns. The United States Government has vigorously pressed, and will continue to press, these compliance issues with the Soviet Union through diplomatic channels.

Our approach in pursuing these issues with the Soviet Union is to ensure that both the letter and intent of treaty obligations and commitments will be fulfilled. To this end the Administration is: analyzing further issues of possible noncompliance; as noted above, seeking from the Soviet Union through diplomatic channels explanations, clarifications, and, where necessary, corrective actions; reporting on such issues to the Congress; and taking into account in our defense modernization plans the security implications of arms control violations. At the same time, the United States is continuing to carry out its own obligations and commitments under relevant agreements. Our objectives in the new negotiations which begin in March are to reverse the erosion of the ABM Treaty and to seek equitable, effectively verifiable arms control agreements which will result in real reductions and enhance stability. While all of these steps can help, however, it is fundamentally important that the Soviet Union take a constructive attitude toward full compliance with all arms control obligations and commitments.

The Administration and the Congress have a shared interest in supporting the arms control process. For this reason, increased understanding of Soviet violations or probable violations, and a strong Congressional consensus on the importance of compliance to achieving effective arms control, will strengthen our efforts both in the new negotiations and in seeking corrective actions from the Soviet Union.

I look forward to continued close consultation with the Congress as we seek to make progress in resolving compliance issues and in negotiating sound arms control agreements.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 1, 1985.

BUDGET OF THE U.S. GOVERNMENT FOR FISCAL YEAR 1986—MESSAGE RECEIVED FROM THE PRESIDENT DURING THE RECESS—PM 13

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1985, the Secretary of the Senate, on February 4, 1985, during the recess of the Senate, received the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which, pursuant to the order of January 30, 1985, was referred jointly to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Congress of the United States:

In the past 2 years we have experienced one of the strongest economic recoveries of the post-war period. The prospect of a substantially brighter future for America lies before us. As 1985 begins, the economy is growing robustly and shows considerable upward momentum. Favorable financial conditions presage a continuation of the expansion. Production, productivity, and employment gains have been impressive, and inflation remains well under control. I am proud of the state of our economy. Let me highlight a few points:

—The economy expanded at a 6.8% rate in 1984 and at a 6% annual rate over the 2 years since the recession trough at the end of 1982—faster than any other upturn since 1951.

—Confidence in the economy has prompted business firms to expand their capital facilities. Real investment in new plant and equipment has grown 15.4% annually since the end of 1982—faster than in any other post-war recovery.

—The ratio of real investment to real GNP has reached its highest level in the post-war period.

—Industrial production is 23% above its level at the recession trough in November 1982—a greater advance than in any other recovery since 1958.

—Corporate profits have risen nearly 90% since the recession trough in 1982—the fastest 8-quarter increase in 37 years.

—Civilian employment has grown 7.2 million over the past 25 months and the number of unemployed has fallen by 3.7 million. In the last 4 months alone, more than 1.1 million Americans have found jobs.

—Inflation remains well under control. The December 1984 CPI was 4% higher than a year earlier, about a third of the rate of inflation this administration inherited. The GNP deflator, the broadest measure of inflation, increased only 3.5% last year and at only a 2.4% annual rate in the fourth quarter.

—The prime rate of interest is now only half of what it was when I took office.

Contrast our current circumstances with the situation we faced just 4 years ago. Inflation was raging at double-digit rates. Oil prices had soared. The prime rate of interest was over 20%. The economy was stagnating. Unemployment had risen sharply and was to rise further. America's standing in world opinion was at low ebb.

All that, mercifully, is behind us now. The tremendous turnaround in our fortunes did not just happen. In February 1981, I presented the four fundamentals of my economic program. They were:

—Reducing the growth of overall Federal spending by eliminating activities that are beyond the proper sphere of Federal Government responsibilities and by restraining the growth of spending for other activities.

—Limiting tax burdens to the minimum levels necessary to finance only essential government services, thereby strengthening incentives for saving, investment, work, productivity, and economic growth.

—Reducing the Federal regulatory burden where the Federal Government intrudes unnecessarily into our private lives, the efficient conduct of private business, or the operations of State and local governments.

—Supporting a sound and steady monetary policy, to encourage economic growth and bring inflation under control.

FOUR YEARS OF ACCOMPLISHMENT

These policies were designed to restore economic growth and stability. They succeeded.

The past 4 years have also seen the beginning of a quiet but profound revolution in the conduct of our Federal Government. We have halted what seemed at the time an inexorable set of trends toward greater and greater Government intrusiveness, more and more regulation, higher and higher taxes, more and more spending, higher and higher inflation, and weaker and weaker defense. We have halted these trends in our first 4 years.

—The rate of Federal spending growth was out of control at 17.4% a year in 1980. Under my budget proposals the growth of programmatic spending—that is, total Federal spending except for debt service—will be zero next year—frozen at this year's levels.

—Further, spending will grow only 30% over the 4 years from 1982 to 1986, compared to its record pace of 66% between 1977 and 1981, and this despite legislated additions to my program and the needed rebuilding of our defense capabilities.

—The Federal tax system was changed for the better—marginal tax rates were reduced and depreciation reform introduced. These reforms were designed to increase incentives for work, training and education, saving, business growth, and capital expansion. Tax loopholes have been closed, improving the equity of the system.

—Domestic spending, which previously grew faster than any other major part of the budget (nearly fourfold in real terms between 1960 and 1980), will have been virtually frozen from 1981 to 1985.

—Our defense capabilities are now getting back to a level where we can protect our citizens, honor our commitments to our allies, and participate in the long-awaited arms control talks from a position of respected strength.

—Federal credit programs, which had also grown out of control, have been cut back, and their management has been vastly improved.

—The rapid growth of regulations and red tape has also been halted. The number of Federal rules published by agencies has fallen by over 35% during the past 4 years, and many unnecessary old rules have been eliminated. For the first time, the Federal Register of new regulatory actions has grown shorter for 4 consecutive years; it is now 41% shorter than it was in 1980.

—Major management improvement initiatives are underway that will fundamentally change the way the Federal Government operates. The President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control has completed its report, and many of its recommendations are included in this budget. The President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency has reported $46 billion in improved use of funds through reduction of waste and fraud.

—The Federal nondefense work force has been reduced by over 78,000.

The proposals contained in this budget will build on the accomplishments of the last 4 years and put into action a philosophy of government that is working and that has received the overwhelming endorsement of the American people.

THE 1986 BUDGET PROGRAM

If we took no action to curb the growth of spending, Federal outlays would rise to over a trillion dollars in 1986. This would result in deficits exceeding $200 billion in each of the next 5 years. This is unacceptable. The budget I propose, therefore, will reduce spending by $51 billion in 1986, $83 billion in 1987, and $105 billion in 1988. Enactment of these measures would reduce the deficit projected for 1988 to $144 billion—still a far cry from our goal of a balanced budget, but a significant step in the right direction and a 42% reduction from the current services level projected for that year.

Last year my administration worked with Congress to come up with a downpayment on reducing the deficit. This budget commits the Government to a second installment. With comparable commitments to further reductions in the next two budgets, and, I hope, other spending reduction ideas advanced by the Congress, we can achieve our goal in an orderly fashion.

The budget proposes a 1-year freeze in total spending other than debt service. This will be achieved through a combination of freezes, reforms, terminations, cutbacks, and management improvements in individual programs. For a number of reasons, a line-by-line budget freeze is not possible or desirable. Further, such an approach would assume that all programs are of equal importance. Taken together, the specific proposals in this budget hold total Federal spending excluding debt service constant in 1986 at its 1985 level.

The budget proposals provide for substantial cost savings in the medicare program, in Federal payroll costs, in agricultural and other subsidies to business and upper-income groups, in numerous programs providing grants to State and local governments, and in credit programs. A freeze is proposed in the level of some entitlement program benefits, other than social security, means-tested programs, and programs for the disabled, that have hitherto received automatic "cost-of-living adjustments" every year. The budget proposes further reductions in defense spending below previously reduced mid-year levels.

Despite the reforms of the past 4 years, our Federal tax system remains complex and inequitable. Tax rates are still so high that they distort economic decisions, and this reduces economic growth from what it otherwise could be. I will propose, after further consultation with the Congress, further tax simplification and reform. The proposals will not be a scheme to raise taxes—only to distribute their burden more fairly and to simplify the entire system. By broadening the base, we can lower rates.

THE BUDGET TOTALS

[In billions of dollars]

	1984 actual	1985 estimate	1986 estimate	1987 estimate	1988 estimate
Receipts	666.5	736.9	793.7	861.7	950.4
Outlays	851.8	959.1	973.7	1,026.6	1,094.8
Deficit (—)	−185.3	−222.2	−180.0	−164.9	−144.4

Note: Totals include outlays that are off-budget under current law, proposed to be included on-budget.

There will be substantial political resistance to every deficit reduction measure proposed in this budget. Every dollar of current Federal spending benefits someone, and that person has a vested self-interest in seeing these benefits perpetuated and expanded. Prior to my administration, such interests had been dominant and their expectation and demands had been met, time and time again.

Freeze on programmatic outlays

Fiscal year 1985 estimate:	Billions
Programmatic outlays	$804
Debt service	959
Fiscal year 1986 estimate:
Programmatic outlays	804
Debt service	974

At some point, however, the question must be raised: "Where is the political logrolling going to stop?" At some point, the collective demands upon the public Treasury of all the special interests combined exceed the public's ability and willingness to pay. The single most difficult word for a politician to utter is a simple, flat "No." The patience of the American people has been stretched as far as it will go. They want action; they have demanded it.

We said "no" frequently in 1981, and real spending for discretionary domestic programs dropped sharply. But we did not accomplish enough. We now have no choice but to renew our efforts with redoubled vigor. The profusion of Federal domestic spending programs must be reduced to an acceptable, appropriate, and supportable size.

It will require political courage of a high order to carry this program forward in the halls of Congress, but I believe that with good faith and goodwill on all sides, we can succeed. If we fail to reduce excessive Federal benefits to special interest groups, we will be saddled either with larger budget deficits or with higher taxes—either of which would be of greater harm to the American economy and people.

1986 MANAGEMENT AND REGULATORY PROGRAM

Not only must both the scope and scale of Federal spending be drastically cut back to reduce the deficit: we must also institute comprehensive management improvements and administrative reforms to make sure that we use available funds as efficiently as possible.

Tough but necessary steps are being taken throughout the Federal Government to reduce the costs of management and administration. Substantial savings in overhead costs have been achieved under provisions of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984. A 5% Federal civilian employee salary cut has been proposed; a 10% reduction in administrative overhead has been ordered; termination of programs that have outlived their usefulness is proposed; outmoded, inefficient agency field structures that have evolved over the past half-century are being consolidated and streamlined to take advantage of efficiencies made possible by modern transportation, communication, and information technology.

Administration of Federal agencies is being made more efficient through the adoption of staffing standards, automation of manual processes, consolidation of similar functions, and reduction of administrative overhead costs. A program to increase productivity by 20% by 1992 in all appropriate Government functions is being instituted, as are improved cash and credit management systems and error rate reduction programs.

This management improvement program will result in a leaner and more efficient Federal structure and will be described in a management report that I am submitting to the Congress for the first time shortly after my annual budget submission.

We have also made a great deal of progress in reducing the costs imposed on businesses and State and local governments by Federal regulations. These savings are estimated to total $150 billion over a 10-year period. We have reduced the number of new regulations in every year of my first term and have eliminated or reduced paperwork requirements by over 300 million hours each year. In addition, the regulations are more carefully crafted to achieve the greatest protection for the least cost, and wherever possible to use market forces instead of working against them.

A recent Executive Order will strengthen the executive branch coordination that has made these accomplishments possible. For the first time, we will publish an annual program of the most significant regulatory activities, including those that precede the publication of a proposed rule. This will give Congress and the public an earlier opportunity to understand the administration's regulatory policies and priorities.

CONCLUSION

The key elements of the program I set out 4 years ago are in place and working well. Our national security is being restored; so, I am happy to report, is our economy. Growth and investment are healthy; and inflation, interest rates, tax rates, and unemployment are down and can be reduced further. The proliferation of unnecessary regulations that stifled both economic growth and our individual freedoms has been halted. Progress has been made toward the reduction of unwarranted and excessive growth in domestic spending programs.

But we cannot rest on these accomplishments. If we are to attain a new era of sustained peace, prosperity, growth, and freedom, Federal domestic spending must be brought firmly under control. This budget presents the steps that I believe must be taken. I do not exclude other economies that Congress may devise, so long as they do not imperil my fundamental constitutional responsibilities to look after the national defense and the general welfare of the American people.

Let us get on with the job. The time for action is now.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

ECONOMIC REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 14

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Joint Economic Committee:

To the Congress of the United States:

In 1981, when I first assumed the duties of the Presidency, our Nation was suffering from declining productivity and the highest inflation in the postwar period—the legacy of years of government overspending, overtaxing, and overregulation.

We bent all of our efforts to correct these problems, not by unsustainable short-run measures, but by measures that would increase long-term growth without renewed inflation. We removed unnecessary regulations, cut taxes, and slowed the growth of Federal spending, freeing the private sector to develop markets, create jobs, and increase productivity. With conviction in our principles, with patience and hard work, we restored the economy to a condition of healthy growth without substantial inflation.

Although employment is now rising, business opportunities are expanding, and interest rates and inflation are under control, we cannot relax our economic vigilance. A return to the policies of excessive government spending and control that led to the economic "malaise" of the late seventies would quickly draw us back into that same disastrous pattern of inflation and recession. Now is the time to recommit ourselves to the policies that broke that awful pattern: policies of reduced Federal spending, lower tax rates, and less regulation to free the creative energy of our people and lead us to an even better economic future through strong and sustained economic growth.

MAJOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENTS 1981–1984

The Program for Economic Recovery that we initiated in February 1981 had four key elements:

—Budget reform to cut the rate of growth in Federal spending,

—Reductions in personal and business taxes,

—A far-reaching program of regulatory relief, and —Restoration of a stable currency and a healthy financial market through sound monetary policy.

The success of this program is now obvious—the U.S. economy is experiencing the strongest recovery in 30 years;

—Real business fixed investment in plant and equipment is higher, relative to real gross national product, than at any time in the postwar period.

—Productivity growth in the business sector has averaged 2.2 percent since the fourth quarter of 1980, compared with a rate of less than 0.3 percent over the prior 4 years.

—The inflation rate is now about one-third the rate in 1980, and short-term interest rates are less than one-half their peak 1981 levels.

But the quantitative record alone does not tell the full story. Four years ago, there was a widespread and growing anxiety about the economy. Many thought that the Nation had entered a condition of permanent economic decline, and that we would have to live with permanent double-digit inflation unless we were willing to suffer massive long-term unemployment.

We did not share this pessimism. It was clear to us that the Nation's economic problems were not the product of the economic system, but of the onerous influence of government on that system. The creative potential of the American people, choosing their own economic futures, was more constrained than helped by the increasingly heavy hand of government. Nor did we share the negative views that a reduction of inflation would increase long-term unemployment; that economic growth, by itself, would increase inflation; and that the government had to protect a "fragile" market system by regulating oil prices and interest rates.

The primary economic responsibility of the Federal Government is not to make choices for people, but to provide an environment in which people can make their own choices. The performance of the economy in the past 2 years under our Program for Economic Recovery fully justifies our faith in the Nation's basic economic health. In 1983 and 1984 the economy generated about 300,000 new jobs per month without an increase in inflation. Real gross national product increased 5.6 percent during 1984, and the unemployment rate declined from 8.1 percent to 7.1 percent. Inflation was steady at its lowest level in more than a decade, and most interest rates are now lower than a year ago. Yet while the U.S. economy grew rapidly in 1984, it maintains the potential for continued strong growth. The inventory/sales ratio is low by historical standards, and capacity utilization rates in most industries are well below prior peak rates.

Economic conditions in 1984 were more favorable than during the second year of a typical recovery, and we see none of the warning signs that usually precede the end of an expansion. The temporary slowing of economic growth starting in July—reflecting the combination of a minor adjustment of consumer spending and inventories and little growth of the basic money supply—seems to have ended in November. These conditions, plus an expectation that the Federal Reserve System will maintain sufficient money growth, support our forecast that the present recovery will continue. The thriving venture capital market is financing a new American revolution of entrepreneurship and technological change. The American economy is once again the envy of the world.

THE ECONOMIC OUTLOOK

For the years 1985 through 1988, we assume real gross national product growth of 4 percent per year, slowing slightly in 1989–90. We know that economic recoveries have not been stable in either duration or magnitude, in part because monetary and fiscal policies have often been erratic. We may not be able to eliminate recessions entirely, but a sustained commitment to policies that promote long-term growth and stability can reduce their frequency and severity. Our forecast that the unemployment rate, the inflation rate, and interest rates will decline gradually in the years ahead reflects this commitment to sound, sustainable, and predictable policies.

THE TASK AHEAD: A PROGRAM FOR GROWTH AND OPPORTUNITY

Our 1981 Program for Economic Recovery was designed for the long run with priority attention to the major problems we faced at that time. Our second-term Program for Growth and Opportunity represents a continuation and expansion of the earlier program, with priority attention to the major problems we face in 1985 and beyond. Our objectives—economic growth, stability of the general price level, and increased individual economic opportunity—have not changed. Federal economic policy will continue to be guided by the four key elements of the earlier program. Our progress in solving the most important economic problems we inherited in 1981, however, has allowed us to refocus our attention on the remaining problems and to shift our priorities and resources toward their solution.

Several significant problems remain to be addressed. The rate of growth of Federal spending has been substantially reduced from the rate projected in the budget we inherited in fiscal 1981, but spending growth continues to outpace the economy. Spending too much has left us with a large budget deficit that must and will be reduced. In our efforts to reduce the deficit, we must not forget that the cause of the deficit is increased spending and insufficient growth, not decreased taxes. Federal tax receipts are now almost the same share of gross national product as in the late 1970s, even after the substantial reduction in tax rates that we initiated in 1981.

Another economic problem demanding resolution is unemployment and its effects on the Nation's workers and families. Despite significant progress, much remains to be done. More than 6 million more Americans are now employed than in January 1981, but the unemployment rate is still too high. We will not be satisfied until every American who wants a job is employed at a wage that reflects the market value of his or her skills. Another aspect of this problem is that the poverty rate remains stubbornly high, despite a strong recovery and a continued increase in government assistance. Also, although the inflation rate has been reduced substantially, it is still higher than during most of our peacetime history prior to 1965. We will not be satisfied until we have totally and permanently wrung inflation out of our economy.

Work also remains to be done in the areas of regulatory and monetary policy. Many Federal regulations still impose a substantial cost to the economy. In addition, we need to strengthen the commitment to a sound monetary policy that never again retards economic growth, or reaccelerates inflation.

Our trade deficit, another area of concern, has been caused in large part by a strong dollar. Investors around the world have bid up the dollar as they have become increasingly confident in our economy. That confidence is an asset and not a liability. However, the conditions that have led to the trade deficit have increased the obstacles faced by some important industries. Agriculture, one of our most productive export sectors, has been harmed by a combination of rigid and outdated Federal agricultural policies and subsidized foreign competition as well as by the strong dollar. Some of our import-competing industries, such as steel, have also been hurt by subsidized foreign competition and the strong dollar. In one respect the trade deficit is like the budget deficit; both are too large to be sustained, but there are both beneficial and detrimental ways to reduce them. Our goal is a system of free and fair trade in goods, services, and capital. We will work toward this goal through both bilateral and multilateral agreements.

Economic conditions during the past 4 years are best characterized as transitional—from a period of low productivity growth to a period of high productivity growth; from a period of high inflation and interest rates to a period of much lower inflation and interest rates; from a period of economic "malaise" to a period of economic opportunity. Our task is to consolidate and extend these gains.

FEDERAL SPENDING AND THE DEFICIT

The rate of growth of Federal spending has been reduced from 14.8 percent in fiscal 1981 to an average rate of 9.1 percent in fiscal years 1982 through 1985. During this period, however, current dollar gross national product has increased at an average rate of 7.6 percent. The continued growth of the Federal spending share of gross national product and lost revenues from the recession are the main reasons we are now faced with such large Federal deficits.

The projected Federal deficits are much too large, and they must be reduced. As explained in the accompanying report, however, the economic consequences of reducing these deficits depend critically on how they are reduced. A sustained reduction of the growth of Federal spending will contribute to economic growth, while an increase in tax rates would constrain economic growth. Federal spending on many programs is far larger than necessary, and far larger than desired by most Americans.

My fiscal 1986 budget proposal will protect the social safety net and essential programs, such as defense, for which the Federal Government has a clear constitutional responsibility, and will reform or eliminate many programs that have proven ineffective or nonessential. With no resort to a tax increase, this budget will reduce the deficit to about 4 percent of gross national product in fiscal 1986 and to a steadily lower percentage in future years. Additional spending reductions will probably be necessary in future years to achieve a balanced budget by the end of the decade.

The problems of excessive spending and deficits are not new. In the absence of fundamental reform, they may recur again and again in the future. I therefore support two important measures—one to authorize the President to veto individual line items in comprehensive spending bills, and another to constrain the Federal authority to borrow or to increase spending in the absence of broad congressional support. These structural changes are not substitutes for the hard fiscal choices that will be necessary in 1985 and beyond, nor for the need to simplify our tax system to stimulate greater growth; but they are important to provide the mechanisms and discipline for longer term fiscal health.

The case for a line-item veto should by now be obvious. The Governors of 43 States have used this authority effectively, and such authority has only once been withdrawn, only later to be reinstated. For over a century, Presidents of both parties have requested such authority.

The proposed constitutional amendment providing for a balanced budget and a tax limitation would constrain the long-run growth of Federal spending and the national debt. In 1982 a proposed amendment to constrain Federal authority to spend and borrow was approved by more than two-thirds of the Senate and by more than a majority of the House of Representatives; a balanced budget amendment has also been endorsed by the legislatures of 32 States. Approval of the proposed balanced budget/tax limitation amendment would ensure that fiscal decisions by future Presidents and Members of Congress are more responsive to the broad interests of the American population.

FEDERAL TAXATION

The Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 was one of the most important accomplishments of my first term. Individual income tax rates were reduced nearly 25 percent, effective tax rates on the income from new investment were substantially reduced, and beginning this year tax brackets are adjusted for inflation.

But more needs to be done. Personal tax rates should be reduced further to encourage stronger economic growth which, in itself, is our best tool for putting deficits on a steady downward path. Our tax system needs basic reform. It is extraordinarily complicated; it leads to substantial economic inefficiency; and it is widely perceived to be unfair.

At my request, the Treasury Department has developed a comprehensive proposal to simplify and reform the Federal tax system, one that for expected economic conditions would yield about the same revenues as the present system. This proposal, by substantially broadening the tax base, would permit a significant further reduction of marginal tax rates. Shortly, I will be submitting my own proposal for tax simplification, and will urge the Congress to give serious sustained attention to tax simplification—in order to enact a program that will increase fairness and stimulate future savings, investment, and growth.

FEDERAL REGULATION

We have made major efforts in the past 4 years to reduce and eliminate Federal regulation of economic activity. Executive Office review of new regulations was streamlined. Oil prices were deregulated by Executive authority early in 1981. New legislation was approved to reduce regulation of banking and to largely eliminate regulation of interstate bus travel.

Regulatory reform, however, has been painfully slow. The Congress failed to approve our proposals to further deregulate banking and natural gas prices, and to reform the regulation of private pensions. In addition, the reauthorization of several major environmental laws has been delayed for several years.

I urge the Congress to consider further deregulation efforts in several areas. The experience with deregulation of oil prices makes clear that continued regulation of natural gas prices is not appropriate. Reform of nuclear licensing requirements also deserves attention. Further deregulation of the banking system should be paired with a major reform of the deposit insurance systems. Some changes in the single-employer pension law and an increased premium are necessary to preserve the pension insurance system. We should also seriously consider eliminating the remaining Federal regulation of trucking and railroads. Finally, I remain hopeful that the Administration and the Congress can work together to reauthorize the major environmental laws in a way that serves our common environmental and economic goals.

MONETARY POLICY

The Constitution authorizes the Congress "To coin Money (and) regulate the Value thereof," and Congress has delegated this authority to the Federal Reserve System. The role of the executive branch is restricted to advising the Congress and the Federal Reserve about the conduct of monetary policy, and to nominating members of the Board of Governors as positions become vacant.

During my first term, the Federal Reserve reduced the rate of money growth relative to the high rates of the late 1970s. This change in policy, assisted by the related strong increase in the exchange value of the dollar helped produce a substantial reduction of inflation and market interest rates. On occasion, however, the rate of money growth has been quite volatile, contributing to instability in interest rates and a decline in economic activity. The sharp reduction in money growth through mid-1982, for example, undoubtedly added to the length and severity of the 1981-1982 recession. And a similar reduction in money growth in the second half of 1984 contributed to the temporary slowing of economic growth late in the year.

We reaffirm our support for a sound monetary policy that contributes to strong, steady economic growth and price stability. Moreover, we expect to cooperate closely with the Federal Reserve in defining and carrying out a prudent and predictable monetary policy.

CONCLUSION

The Federal Government has only a few important economic responsibilities. Given a proper conduct of these important roles, additional Federal intervention is more often a part of the problem than a part of the solution. We should continue to reduce the many less-important economic activities of the Federal Government so that individuals, private institutions, and State and local governments will have more resources and more freedom to pursue their own interests. Good stewardship of our constitutional responsibilities and the creative energies of the American people will ensure a future of continued economic growth and opportunity.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 2:09 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that pursuant to the provisions of 15 United States Code, section 1024(a), the Speaker appoints as additional members of the Joint Economic Committee the following Members on the part of the House: Mr. WYLIE, Mrs. HOLT, Mr. LUNGREN, and Ms. SNOWE.

The message also announced that pursuant to the provisions of 22 United States Code, section 276a-1, the Speaker appoints Mr. PEPPER as chairman, and Mr. HAMILTON as vice chairman of the delegation on the part of the House to attend the Conference of the Interparliamentary Union to be held in Lome, Togo, on March 25 through March 30, 1985.

The message further announced that pursuant to the provisions of section 4(a) of Public Law 98-399, the Speaker appoints as members of the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission, the following Members on the part of the House: Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania, Mr. LELAND, Mr. REGULA, and Mr. COURTER.

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS

The following communications were laid before the Senate, together with accompanying papers, reports, and documents, which were referred as indicated:

EC-360. A communication from the Fiscal Assistant Secretary of the Treasury transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the amount of revenue deposited in the Panama Canal Commission Fund during fiscal year 1984; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-361. A communication from the President and Chairman of the Export-Import Bank of the United States transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on a transaction involving U.S. exports to Japan; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

EC-362. A communication from the Chairman of the Board of the U.S. Synthetic Fuels Corp. transmitting, pursuant to law, the Corporation's 1984 Annual Report; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

EC-363. A communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on compensatory oil and gas royalty agreements involving unleased Government lands for 1984; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

EC-364. A communication from the Secretary of Energy transmitting, pursuant to law, the eighth Annual Report on Federal Energy Education, Extension, and Information Activities; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

EC-365. A communication from the Acting Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the implementation of the Clean Air Act; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

EC-366. A communication from the Administrator of the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation transmitting, pursuant to law, a summary of 39 major Seaway accomplishments during 1984; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

EC-367. A communication from the Chairman of the Board for International Broadcasting transmitting, pursuant to law, its annual report for 1984; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EC-368. A communication from the Acting Assistant Secretary of State transmitting, pursuant to law, a determination for continued U.S. assistance to Haiti; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EC-369. A communication from the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the Agency's system of internal accounting and administrative control; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-370. A communication from the Acting Administrator of the General Services Administration transmitting, pursuant to law, an evaluation of GSA's systems of management control; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-371. A communication from the Chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the Commission's system of internal control and accounting system; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-372. A communication from the D.C. Auditor transmitting, pursuant to law, a report entitled "Review of D.C. Lottery Contracts with former Council Chairman"; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-373. A communication from the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the 15 positions in grades 16, 17, and 18 allocated by statute to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. CHAFEE:

S. 376. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to deny an employer a deduction for group health plan expenses unless such plan includes coverage for pediatric preventive health care; to the Committee on Finance.

CHILD HEALTH INCENTIVES REFORM PLAN

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am pleased to offer legislation today that will require businesses to include children's preventive care and health supervision services in their employee health benefit packages. Such services would be required for the insurance premiums to be deductible as a business expense.

Employer group health insurance plans are the major method of financing health care in the United States. Over 90 percent of all employment groups now have some form of private health insurance. Few Americans would disagree with the old adage "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," yet our present system of health care contradicts this proposition. Unfortunately, most coverage provided by health insurance plans is aimed at acute care, not preventive care. The result is an acute care system, in which costs are out of control, rather than a true health insurance system that would avoid unnecessary illnesses.

Nowhere is this focus less appropriate than when it is applied to children. Unfortunately, group health insurance plans have been given no incentive to cover the services children need most.

The legislation I am introducing today, the child health incentives reform plan [CHIRP], focuses on children for a simple reason, more than any other age group in the population, children require regular preventive care and screening to detect and prevent disease and disorders. Preventive care not only improves their overall health but it is also cost effective.

More than one study has shown that immunizations save money in the long run. Results indicate that for every dollar spent on measles vaccinations, $10 was saved and for every dollar spent on mumps vaccinations, $7.40 was saved. Other studies have demonstrated that eligible Medicaid children provided with early and periodic screening, diagnosis, and treatment [EPSDT] had 30 to 50 percent lower hospital and medical costs than other Medicaid children.

Opponents to health insurance coverage for preventive services for children argue that regular health screenings are a budgetable expense. However, young families with children generally have limited incomes and must rely heavily on their employer-provided health insurance. If the plan does not cover preventive health care, such as immunizations, many families will wait for serious symptoms to appear before paying for care. The sad truth is that 24 percent of all pre-school-age children are not immunized. Besides the tragic diminution in the quality of life for a child left retarded by measles, the cost of lifetime institutional care can be staggering. The Children's Defense Fund estimates the cost at between $500,000 and $1,000,000.

The average monthly cost per family for the additional coverage outlined in the bill would be at the most $2.28, or about 1 percent of the employer's current payment. The cost for all recommended services from birth through the age of 20 is approximately equal to the cost of 1 day in the hospital.

I believe that this is an important step to take and support for this measure will come from all groups in our society who feel as I do: That our children are our most important and precious asset and that their health must be protected.●

By Mr. DECONCINI (for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. PELL, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, and Mr. LEAHY):

S. 377. A bill to provide for a General Accounting Office investigation and report on conditions of displaced Salvadorans, to provide certain rules of the House of Representatives and of the Senate with respect to review of the report, to provide for the temporary stay of detention and deportation of certain Salvadorans, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INVESTIGATION AND REPORT WITH RESPECT TO DISPLACED SALVADORANS

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to suspend the deportation of Salvadorans from the United States and to require the impartial General Accounting Office to study and report to Congress the living conditions and security of displaced Salvadorans in Central America.

Many of us in Congress have been trying for the last 5 years to persuade the Department of Justice to stop the deportations of Salvadorans from the United States. Although Congress adopted a resolution in 1983 recommending that Salvadorans be granted extended voluntary departure [EVD] status in the United States, the Reagan administration has simply ignored it. In November 1983, Representative JOE MOAKLEY and I introduced legislation to require that the United States suspend the deportations. The Moakley bill was reported near the end of the last Congress by the House Immigration Subcommittee. The leadership of this body did not feel the issue to be important enough to schedule hearings on my bill, S. 2131.

There is renewed interest in the plight of Salvadorans at this time because of the ongoing Government prosecution of religious leaders involved in the sanctuary movement in the United States. While I do not condone the activities of those in the sanctuary movement, I certainly understand and sympathize with their motives. I believe, however, that instead of breaking the law, we should strengthen our resolve to change it.

The nation of El Salvador, a country about the size of Massachusetts, is plagued with widespread violence—both random and specifically directed. Amnesty International reports that at least 40,000 civilians have been killed since 1980. It is also estimated that 1 million people or 20 percent of the population of El Salvador is externally or internally displaced. Half a million are still in Central America, particularly Honduras, Guatemala, Mexico, and El Salvador itself. Another half a million are in the United States. INS has estimated that 250,000 of these Salvadorans have entered since January 1980. There are approximately 65,000 Salvadorans in the metropolitan Washington, DC, area alone.

The United States has repatriated, through deportation or voluntary departure, approximately 35,000 Salvadorans in the last 5 years. Thousands of Salvadorans have applied for political asylum, but only 3.3 percent have been granted such status. This figure is drastically lower than such countries as Iran, Ethiopia, Honduras, Nicaragua, or Poland.

Although I question the low percentage of asylum claims approved, it is important to point out that my legislation is not intended to raise it. My legislation is not designed, nor should it be interpreted to protect persons who can prove an individual well-founded fear of persecution. If an individual is being targeted as a returnee, he or she should be granted asylum. Suspension of deportation or EVD should be granted because of the general condition of violence that exists in El Salvador.

I do not offer this legislation as a criticism of the administration's policies in El Salvador or Central America. I have supported U.S. policy in El Salvador because I believe it is in the best interests of both countries. However, along with that involvement comes certain responsibilities. We have a responsibility to these distressed people to protect them from violence, both random and specific. It is my hope that the serious nature of this problem will be realized and that Congress will take action on this issue early in this session.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 377

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I—GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE INVESTIGATION AND REPORT

INVESTIGATION

SEC. 101. (a) REQUIRING GAO INVESTIGATION ON DISPLACED SALVADORANS.—Within 60 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Comptroller General shall begin an investigation concerning displaced nationals of El Salvador.

(b) DETERMINATIONS ON DISPLACED SALVADORANS IN CENTRAL AMERICA.—The investigation shall determine the following with respect to displaced Salvadorans who are present in either El Salvador, Honduras, Guatamala, or Mexico, regardless of whether or not they are registered:

(1) The number of these displaced persons and their current locations.

(2) Their place of origin in El Salvador and the period of, and reason for, their displacement.

(3) Their current living conditions, with particular attention to (A) their personal safety and the personal safety of those providing assistance to them, and (B) the availability of food and medical assistance.

(4) An assessment of (A) current efforts to provide food, medical assistance, housing, and other necessities and to secure personal safety for these persons, and (B) policies and procedures that reasonably could be implemented to assure more efficient and equitable distribution of this assistance.

(5) The impact of the war in El Salvador and of activities of officers of the Government or political parties in El Salvador on the matters described in the previous paragraphs.

(c) DETERMINATIONS ON SALVADORANS RETURNED TO EL SALVADOR FROM THE UNITED STATES.—In the case of nationals of El Salvador who have been required (whether through deportation, voluntary departure proceeding, or otherwise) to depart from the United States and who return to El Salvador, the investigation shall assess—

(1) their condition and circumstances in El Salvador upon return from the United States, with particular attention to any violations of fundamental human rights that have occurred upon their return to El Salvador, and

(2) the extent to which these persons, upon their return, have become displaced persons within El Salvador.

(d) DETERMINATIONS ON SALVADORANS IN THE UNITED STATES IN AN UNLAWFUL STATUS.—In the case of nationals of El Salvador who are present in the United States in an unlawful status, the investigation shall—

(1) compare the situation in El Salvador with the situation in other countries during periods when nationals of those countries have been provided administrative grants of extended voluntary departure under the immigration laws,

(2) describe the policies and procedures of the United States respecting the treatment of aliens (other than Salvadorans) in the United States in similar circumstances, and

(3) describe the policies of all other countries in which Salvadorans have sought refuge as these policies concern the return of the Salvadorans to El Salvador.

REPORT

SEC. 102. The Comptroller General shall submit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, not later than one year after the date of the initiation of the study under section 101, a report on that study including detailed findings on the items described in subsections (b), (c), and (d), of that section.

TITLE II—CONGRESSIONAL REVIEW

REFERRAL OF REPORT, COMMITTEE HEARINGS, AND COMMITTEE REPORT

SEC. 201. (a) Referral.—The report, when submitted under section 102, shall be referred, in accordance with the rules of each House, to the standing committee or committees of each House of Congress having jurisdiction over the subjects of the report, and the report shall be printed as a document of the House of Representatives.

(b) COMMITTEE HEARINGS. —No later than 90 days of continuous session of Congress after the date of the referral of the report to a committee, the committee shall initiate hearings, insofar as such committee has legislative or oversight jurisdiction, to consider—

(1) the findings of the report,

(2) the appropriate steps that should be taken to provide assurances of personal safety and adequate, efficient and equitable distribution of assistance with respect to Salvadorans who are displaced within El Salvador or who have fled to other countries in Central America,

(3) treaty obligations of the United States, humanitarian considerations, and previous practice of the United States respecting the treatment of aliens in similar circumstances, and

(4) whether it is appropriate to extend, remove, or alter the restrictions contained in title III.

(c) COMMITTEE REPORT.—No later than 270 days of continuous session of the Congress after the date of the referral of the report to a committee, the committee shall report to its respective House its oversight findings and any legislation it deems appropriate.

(d) TREATMENT OF CONTINUITY OF SESSION.—For purposes of this Act, continuity of session of Congress is broken only by an adjournment sine die at the end of the second regular session of a Congress, and days on which either House of Congress is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 10 days to a date certain are excluded from the computation of the periods of continuous session of Congress.

TITLE III—TEMPORARY STAY OF DEPORTATION

LIMITATION ON DETENTION AND DEPORTATION

SEC. 301. (a) LIMITATION.—(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), the Attorney General shall not detain or deport (to El Salvador) aliens described in subsection (b) during the period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act and ending 270 days of continuous session of Congress after the date of transmittal of the report of the Comptroller General to the Speaker of the House of Representatives under section 102.

(2) Paragraph (1) shall not be construed to prohibit the brief interrogation of an alien under section 287(a)(1) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1357(a)(1)) for the purpose of determining whether this section applies to particular aliens.

(b) SALVADORANS COVERED BY THE LIMITATION.—The nationals referred to in subsection (a)(1) are aliens who—

"(1) are nationals of El Salvador,

"(2) are continuously present in the United States since the date of the enactment of this act, and

"(3) are determined to be deportable only under—

(A) paragraph (1) of section 241(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1251(a)), but only as such paragraph relates to a ground for exclusion described in paragraph (14), (15), (20), (21), (25), or (32) of section 212(a) of such Act (8 U.S.C. 1182(a)), or

(B) under paragraph (2), (9), or (10) of section 241(a) of such Act (8 U.S.C. 1254(a)).

PERIOD OF STAY OF DEPORTATION NOT COUNTED TOWARDS OBTAINING SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION BENEFIT

SEC. 302. With respect to an alien whose deportation is temporarily stayed under section 301 during a period, the period of the stay shall not be counted as a period of physical presence in the United States for purposes of section 244(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1254(a)).

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise in support of this legislation which would grant extended voluntary departure status to the many Salvadorans who have sought sanctuary in this country, and I ask unanimous consent that I be added as a cosponsor of this bill.

I would first like to commend the Senator from Arizona, Senator DECONCINI, for his continuing efforts to bring this issue to the attention of the Senate. I have joined with the Senator from Arizona on several occasions in the past to express my support for the granting of refugee status for the displaced Salvadorans. In September 1983, I cosponsored a sense of the Congress resolution to this effect. In April of last year, I became a cosponsor of S. 2131, which did not receive a hearing in the Senate Judiciary Committee, despite attracting 21 cosponsors.

Once again, I have decided to support this proposal despite some reservations about the legislation and despite the marked improvement in human rights conditions in El Salvador in the past year. I consider President Duarte of El Salvador not only a friend, but also a man worthy of our highest respect for his courage and his devotion to democratic principles. Under President Duarte's leadership, El Salvador has made significant strides in establishing and strengthening democratic institutions, despite the opposition of authoritarian forces on the right and totalitarian forces on the left. It is vitally important that we, in the United States, recognize that a strong and vibrant democracy cannot be constructed overnight in any nation, yet that is exactly what many have demanded of El Salvador. In a recent speech, President Duarte cited the successes of, and the challenges to, the democratic process in El Salvador:

El Salvador faces in 1984 a new and different reality than that of 4 or 5 years ago. The people have confirmed that their decision at the polls has been respected. The violation of human rights and abuses of authority have decreased. The campesinos and the workers are part of the government; they are assembled in cooperatives to work the land. The people in the country who formerly rented the land have become owners of such land. And the Salvadorean armed forces, since October 1979, with an unparalleled historical institutional attitude, heralded the coming of a new era for El Salvador. Realities are now different in El Salvador.

I think that few impartial observers would contend that the forces of democracy have not made significant progress in El Salvador in the past 4 or 5 years. The Salvadoran electoral process has come a long way since 1979, as reflected in the successful enfranchisement of over 75 percent of the Salvadoran voting population in the 1984 Presidential election. Significant reform programs in agriculture and banking have been initiated, but our Salvadoran policy must reflect our support for the goals of these reforms. Much remains to be done in the area of judicial reform, but a number of steps have been taken in the past year to strengthen public respect for legal institutions. Grim as the figures on death squad killings are, President Duarte has been notably successful in reducing the incidence of death-squad violence. In a recent article, the Economist provided an excellent assessment of trends in violence in El Salvador:

The main chronicler of death-squad activity is Socorro Juridico, the legal aid department of the archbishopric of San Salvador. Its statistics are considered inflated by the American Embassy in El Salvador and Socorro's lawyers make no secret of their anti-government feelings. Still, people turn to Socorro when a member of the family is taken away in the night. Socorro's spokesman told your correspondent that there had been "quite a big reduction in death-squad killings since Duarte became President."

The total of noncombatant killings by the army, the security forces, and paramilitary groups has declined from a high of 16,200 in 1981 to a provisional figure of 2,500 last year. Since Mr. Duarte's inauguration in June, the killings, which were running at around 300 a month, have dropped to around 120 a month. Three-fifths of these are not in fact carried out by the death squads but by the armed forces during anti-guerrilla sweeps.

I don't believe that anyone would argue that this record could not be improved, and I feel that American policy in El Salvador should continue to encourage this trend. It is clear by the reception of the Salvadoran people to the peace process which was begun by President Duarte at La Palma that the average Salvadoran is sick and tired of the civil war which has plagued his country since 1979.

Both President Duarte and various Salvadoran guerrilla leaders have repeatedly spoken of the need to "humanize" the war. It is my belief that the United States can contribute to this healing process by granting extended voluntary departure status to the many displaced Salvadorans in this country. Immediate repatriation in some areas of El Salvador, specifically a large portion of the eastern third of that country, is simply inhumane. Extended voluntary departure makes the United States a temporary haven until safe repatriation can be guaranteed.

Sadly, participants on both sides of this issue, in the sanctuary movement and policymakers in the Immigration and Naturalization Service, have chosen to become embroiled in a dispute over the legality or providing sanctuary to these unfortunate refugees. A recent editorial in the Minneapolis Star and Tribune aptly summed up this conflict:

The escalating confrontation between Federal authorities and the sanctuary movement for people fleeing El Salvador and Guatemala is unfortunate and unnecessary. Both the movement and the U.S. Government share the blame, for both are using the Central Americans in a political argument over U.S. foreign policy.

In my view, the primary objective of both parties should be to alleviate the suffering and to care for the hundreds of thousands of Central American refugees already in this country, not to carry on some unresolving ideological dispute over the conduct of our foreign policy. As I've stated in the past, my support of the granting of extended voluntary departure stems from my firm conviction that it is a humanitarian approach for dealing with a serious problem that exceeds the bounds of human decency. It is a humane approach to an inhumane problem. Because of its long tradition of responding in a humane manner to the suffering of those less fortunate than we, it is my hope that the U.S. Government will realize that it has a special responsibility in this instance because of its support for the Salvadoran Government. So long as the level of violence and instability remains as high as it is in El Salvador, I think that we, in the United States, have a responsibility not to deport these Salvadorans.

Before I concluded my remarks, I would like to briefly discuss a developing refugee situation which has been all but ignored by the Congress, the executive branch, the media, and the church community. The plight of the Salvadorans has been widely reported and extensively investigated by a wide range of organizations. To a somewhat lesser extent, the same can be said of the many displaced Guatemalan refugees now in this country and in Mexico. Strangely enough, there seems to be a conspiracy of silence associated with the many thousands of Nicaraguan refugees now in Costa Rica, Honduras, the United States, and Mexico. Although it is impossible to determine the exact number of displaced Nicaraguans in this country, the Immigration and Naturalization Service estimates that there are more than 50,000 in this country.

The number of Nicaraguan refugees scattered throughout the countries of Central America has not been definitively determined. The U.S. High Commissioner for Refugees [UNHCR] maintains camps both in Honduras and Costa Rica. Approximately 20,000 Nicaraguans now live in UNHCR camps north of the Rio Coco in Honduras. Perhaps as many as 10,000 other Nicaraguans live in various camps maintained by other organizations in Honduras. In Costa Rica, at least 4,000 Nicaraguans live in UNHCR camps. Various sources offer much higher figures for the number of Nicaraguans now living in exile in Costa Rica. As the Nicaraguan civil war intensifies and as larger and larger numbers of Nicaraguans flee Sandinista repression, the burden of refugees upon UNHCR will grow. Curiously, many of the relief organizations which have assisted Salvadoran refugees have not been quite so willing to aid the Nicaraguans. I would hope that they would see this refugee situation as one requiring humanitarian assistance rather than partisan political posturing. Senator DECONCINI has assured me that the question of granting extended voluntary departure status for displaced Nicaraguans will be given full consideration when hearings are held on this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that both the article from the Economist and the editorial from the Minneapolis Star and Tribune be printed in the RECORD.

TO SAFEGUARD DISPLACED CENTRAL AMERICANS

The escalating confrontation between federal authorities and the sanctuary movement for people fleeing El Salvador and Guatemala is unfortunate and unnecessary. Both the movement and the U.S. government share the blame, for both are using the Central Americans in a political argument over U.S. foreign policy.

Providing refuge for displaced Central Americans is commendable. But those in the sanctuary movement sometimes seem more interested in challenging U.S. policies than in ministering to human beings who need help. That tendency is apparent in the movement's insistence that Central Americans be admitted to the United States as "political refugees." Claiming refugee status makes sense as a legal tactic to delay individual deportations, but such a claim on behalf of all Central Americans entering the United States is neither credible nor helpful.

"Political refugee" has a narrow legal meaning: individuals who fear they will be persecuted or killed for their political views if returned to their native land. Because the governments that do the persecuting and killing enjoy strong U.S. support, pressure for "political refugee" status is freighted with criticism of U.S. policy. The Reagan administration cannot accept the Central Americans as refugees without casting the Salvadoran and Guatemalan governments in a bad light. So U.S. officials insist—wrongly, we think—that most Central Americans come to the United States only in search of jobs. Thus the political contest is joined.

That contest grew vicious with a recent federal crackdown on the sanctuary movement. While the sanctuaries have violated U.S. law by helping smuggle people into the United States, the crackdown was far out of proportion to the movement's small effect on illegal immigration. The federal action seemed a political response to the movement's attack on U.S. policy in Central America.

Meanwhile, the focus has shifted away from caring for the hundreds of thousands of needy Central Americans already in this country illegally. Most are neither "political refugees" nor mere job seekers. They are ordinary people fleeing generalized violence that has claimed tens of thousands of lives in the last five years.

Help for these people need not be encumbered by debates about U.S. foreign policy: Grant them "extended voluntary departure," a more neutral status than "political refugee." "Extended voluntary departure" makes the United States a temporary haven when immediate repatriation is unsafe. Such protection has been granted to Ethiopians, Poles, Ugandans, Lebanese, Afghans, Cubans, Chileans and others.

While the Reagan administration has refused such status for Central Americans, Congress could force the issue by voting to prohibit further deportations. But Congress will act only if the public exerts strong pressure, untainted by challenges to U.S. foreign policy.

Reagan administration policies offer legitimate targets for activist opposition. But that opposition should remain separate from efforts to ensure the well-being of those displaced by violence in Central America.

EL SALVADOR—WHEN THE KILLING HAS TO STOP

Such bones as still lie on El Playon, El Salvador's lava-bed dumping ground for death-squad victims, are rather old these days. The killers who used to put them there have not been brought to trail nor, for the most part, dismissed from their jobs in the security forces. But the country's president, Mr. Jose Napoleon Duarte, has gone a long way towards redeeming his election pledge last spring to "remove the people's fear".

The main chronicler of death-squad activity is Socorro Juridico, the legal aid department of the archbishopric of San Salvador. Its statistics are considered inflated by the American embassy in San Salvador, and Socorro's lawyers make no secret of their anti-government feelings. Still, people turn to Socorro when a member of the family is taken away in the night. The organization's spokesman told your correspondent that there had been "quite a big reduction in death-squad killings since Duarte became president".

The total of non-combatant killings by the army, the security forces and paramilitary groups has declined from a high of 16,200 in 1981 to a provisional figure of 2,500 last year. Since Mr. Duarte's inauguration in June, the killings, which were running at around 300 a month, have dropped to around 120 a month. Three fifths of these are not in fact carried out by the death squads but by the armed forced during anti-guerrilla sweeps.

Early last year artillery and aerial bombardment was widely used to soften up guerrilla targets. In the first four months of 1983 there were some 14 bombings of populated areas by the air force, as well as five artillery bombardments by the army and four joint operations. El Salvador's guerrillas sought an end to these attactks in their two meetings last year with government officials: President Duarte has promised an improvement. Socorro says the attacks are falling off, although it claims that this is because the guerrillas are now taking refuge in heavily populated areas which the army is reluctant to bomb.

The massacres of civilians by army men has dropped off sharply, as American trainers have persuaded Salvadorean soldiers that the best way of getting information on guerrilla movements is to treat civilians half-decently. More than 100 civilians died in two massacres in Chalatenango province last summer, but no big slaughters have been reported since. Socorro Juridico claims that there have been only isolated instances of guerrillas killing civilians. Some 2,000 soldiers died at the guerrillas' hands last year.

The death squads themselves consist mainly of off-duty members of the two main security forces—the Finance Police (whose nominal job is to collect taxes) and the National Guard. The link is proven: Socorro showed your correspondent photographs of National Guardsmen handing two young brothers over to casually dressed men, who shoved them into the back of a truck. A day later, the brothers were found dead.

Death-squad victims are often men who have been taken in for questioning by the security forces, then released, only to disappear a couple of days later. Socorro claims that the number taken in for questioning has sharply increased under Mr. Duarte's government, although fewer disappear afterwards. Officials of the interior ministry do not deny that most of the killers come from the two forces, although not from the army itself. "There is a culture of violence within the Finance Police, in particular. Part of the problem is education," said one of Mr. Duarte's senior ministers.

The president's first move against the squads was to set up a parliamentary commission to look into the problem. In October commission members were themselves threatened by one of the main groups, the Secret Anti-Communist Army; inquiries are now proceeding, at snail's pace. The ministry of justice, which is responsible for bringing prosecutions, is largely in the hands of functionaries loyal to Arena, the far-right party to which the death squads are said to be linked.

So far, only five National Guardsmen have been convicted for their part in a death-squad killing-that of four American nuns in 1980, which became a cause célèbre in the United States. Two more members of the security forces are expected to be tried soon for their alleged role in the killing of two land reform advisers in San Salvador's main hotel in 1981. Charges may also be brought soon against those involved in the murder of San Salvador's Archbishop Romero in 1980. The police disclosed on January 14 that they had uncovered a plot against the current archbishop, Monsignor Riverary Damas, who acted as the main broker between the government and the guerrillas last year.

The overwhelming majority of the 20,000 or so death-squad killings over the past four years are likely to go unpunished in a society where killing is the traditional way of resolving disputes. The carnage has diminished largely because of a shake-up in the Financial Police: its head, Colonel Nicolas Carranza, was posted off as El Salvador's military attaché in Bonn. Colonel Reynaldo Golcher, his successor, is seeking a "cultural change" in the attitude of his men, to turn them toward ordinary policing. The 18 members of the intelligence wing of the Finance Police, S2, have been transferred from San Salvador to regional postings.

The government's critics say the repressive apparatus could be reactivated if Mr. Duarte loses his continuing struggle with the far right (which dominates congress) or if the guerrillas make a comeback. Mr. Duarte, however, has been helped by the warnings about human rights issued by the United States. Senior officers know that the price of a resurgence of the death squads is the loss of some $200m in military aid a year.

The improvement in El Salvador is a long way short of what campaigners in the United States and western Europe would like. Socorro insists that human rights are "qualitative, not quantitative". But Mr. Duarte has probably made as big a step toward civilising his country as is possible in the harsh context of Salvadorean politics.

S. 379. A bill entitled the "Health Care Cost Containment Act of 1985"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(The remarks of Mr. SPECTER and the text of this legislation appear earlier in today's RECORD.)

By Mr. DOMENICI:

S. 380. A bill to amend section 504 of title 5, United States Code, and section 2412 of title 28, United States Code, with respect to awards of expenses of certain agency and court proceedings, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AWARDS OF CERTAIN EXPENSES IN AGENCY AND COURT PROCEEDINGS

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, this will mark the fourth Congress wherein I have introduced legislation to reimburse individual Americans and small businessmen and women who successfully litigate against the Federal bureaucracy. In the 96th Congress, we passed a law with a sunset provision so the Congress could monitor this experimental exception of the "American rule" regarding legal fees.

In the second session of the last Congress, a permanent extension of the legislation passed both bodies of the Congress. Included in that bill were proposals to correct judicial interpretations inconsistent with the original intent of the legislation; corrections technical in nature and corrections to extend the Equal Access to Justice Act, uniformly through the federal system.

The President, unfortunately, took exception to certain portions of the legislation and it was pocket votoed.

As we begin the 99th session of Congress, I, therefore, introduce a bill which will be the framework for the speedy enactment of the continuation of the Equal Access to Justice Act. The White House is presently negotiating with the Judiciary Committees of the Senate and the House. My main concern is that in order to be effective in stemming capricious and arbitrary Government action, our citizens need this act in the Federal Code and we need it quickly.

With this legislation referred to the Judiciary Committee, I promise the American people that this legislation will move with dispatch and that when it is passed it will have a retroactive clause to insure that the Government will remain monetarily responsible for its decisions in the time between the expiration of the original authority, October 1, 1984, and the date of enactment of this reauthorization.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorials be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO SOME VICTORS GO THE LEGAL FEES

(By Ruth Marcus)

Pentagon whistle blower A. Ernest Fitzgerald recovered $200,000 in legal fees after he won his lawsuit against the government to get his old job back.

A Colorado company accused of unfair labor practices was awarded more than $14,000 to cover its legal bills after the government lost the case.

Even the Ku Klux Klan may win some money from the government to pay for the cost of a suit it brought.

They all took advantage of the Equal Access to Justice Act, a nine-month-old federal law that allows small businesses, nonprofit groups and individuals who win legal disputes with the government to recover up to $75 an hour in lawyer's fees and other court costs if the government's position was not "substantially justified."

The law was designed to discourage agencies from bringing frivolous of unwarranted cases and enable people to fight out their battles with the government rather than give up when faced with the prospect of skyhigh legal bills.

Since it took effect last Oct. 1, the law has spawned at least 40 federal court decisions and an equal number of rulings by agencies' administrative law judges, with even more requests for fees still to be decided.

But the amount of money private parties have won since then is far below the $125 million the Justice Department and other opponents had warned the law would cost in its first year alone.

So far, courts have awarded about $680,000 and agencies another $32,000 in legal fees and costs, although the exact amount of several additional awards remains to be determined and the government has appealed many of the assessments against it.

There's "no question" that the act isn't being used as much—or costing as much—as expected, said Stephen Babcock of the Administrative conference of the United States, which monitors the law. "In fact, the awards this year will never even get to $1 million."

Why have successful litigants made so little use of the law, and tended to lose when they did ask for fees, recovering costs in just 16 of about 80 cases decided so far?

"People suspected the government was acting improperly in a lot more cases than they actually were," Babcock speculated.

In addition, he suggested, "It's also possible that because the act exists, government agencies are taking a harder look at the cases they bring"—the chilling effect forecast by those who opposed the law, since agencies that lose cases must pay the costs out of their own tight budgets, unlike most other fee awards, which come out of a general fund appropriated by Congress.

"I've gotten lots of calls from agencies expressing great concern about the possibility of bankrupting themselves," Babcock said.

So far that doesn't seem likely to happen, although agency lawyers said the law was still too new to gauge its eventual effect.

"It is very difficult to consider litigation these days without considering the impact of the Equal Access to Justice Act on our budgets," said Justice Department attorney Susan Herdina, who is monitoring such cases for the department's civil divisions, which represents many government agencies when they are sued.

Even when the government doesn't have to pay for face, Herdina and other government lawyers note, merely having to spend time fighting fee requests puts a strain on agency resources.

Stuart Weisberg of the National Labor Relations Board, which has accounted for half of the cases that were decided at the agency level, said that "there's been no change of policy at all in the general counsel's office to date, but one can only speculate what would happen in the future if, indeed, a significant number of these cases are lost."

Some fee requests "have really been staggering," Weisberg said. "I personally have some trouble with the concept that a company that can afford to pay $125,000 or $150,000 in legal fees essentially to keep out a union would square with my definition of a small business."

The law covers companies with net worths of under $5 million and individuals whose net worth is less than $1 million, along with nonprofit groups and agricultural cooperatives regardless of their wealth.

The biggest victor so far was the Greater Los Angeles Council on Deafness, which won $436,000 to cover its successful suit against several agencies. The group charged that the government had discriminated against the handicapped by failing to require a Los Angeles public television station to provide sign language interpreters for deaf viewers.

The award, which is currently on appeal, was made under both the Equal Access to Justice Act and another federal law allowing legal fees to be recovered in handicapped discrimination cases. The court paid the lawyers $175 an hour for their time, far above the $75 cap set by the new law.

Other cases have involved everything from a horse repossession under the Interior Department's Adopt-a-Horse program to tax quarrels with the Internal Revenue Service.

THE KU KLUX KLAN MAY WIN LEGAL FEE

In the Ku Klux Klan case, currently pending before a Louisiana federal court, the Klan sued to recover its legal fees after successfully challenging a school board regulation, supported by federal agencies, that banned any group that advocates discrimination from using school facilities.

The fee request reached the Supreme Court, which sent the case back to the lower court to reconsider in light of the new law.

If not for the act, whistle blower Fitzgerald would not have been able to recover any of the costs of his decade-long battle for reinstatement. Before the law was passed, Fitzgerald's lawyers had lost their fee requests; after it was in place they settled with the Air Force for $200,000.

A fee is "only going to be collectible where it should be collected," said Fitzgerald's lawyer, John Bodner. "If the statute works properly, I think the government will correct its own actions so that it will not suffer the liability."

But Juan A. del Real, general counsel of the Health and Human Services Department, a defendant in the Klan and handicapped discrimination cases, worried that the cost of the law "may well turn out to be a substantial sum, depending on how many of these claims for attorneys' fees get made. As time goes on, there seems to be a progression in the numbers that are being filed."

FIGHTING A U.S. AGENCY WITH ITS OWN MONEY

(By Mary Thornton)

Last summer a small Washington, D.C., printing and typesetting firm submitted the low bid to the Government Printing Office for a contract to publish the Federal Personnel Manual. But instead of getting the contract, the company, Photo Data Inc., received a terse letter from the GPO stating that the bid was considered "nonresponsible."

Scott Watkins, president of the company, decided to fight in court, and the GPO eventually agreed to award the contract to the firm. But Watkins did not stop there. Using a law that went into effect last Oct. 1, he has convinced a federal judge that the GPO should pay nearly $6,000 in legal costs that the firm incurred during the dispute.

Although a number of similar cases are before the courts, Photo Data is believed to be the first plaintiff to be awarded fees under the Equal Access to Justice Act. It requires federal agencies to pick up the legal fees and costs when they lose a case and can't prove that they had a good reason to bring (or contest) it.

Except for the largest corporations and the wealthiest individuals in America, almost anyone who wins a lawsuit against the government is eligible to collect.

The court has the authority to order the government agency to pay up to $75 per hour in attorney fees, costs for expert witnesses and other incidental expenses.

The law is designed to discourage the government from bringing frivolous or unwarranted cases that individuals or small businesses may not be capable financially of fighting.

In the case of Photo Data, GPO decided to try to settle the case after the company filed suit. The GPO then reexamined Photo Data's presentation, declared the company responsible and accepted its low bid.

Two weeks after receiving the contract, the company filed under the act to collect more than $10,700 in attorney fees and expenses.

U.S. District Judge John Garrett Penn, in an opinion last month, cut back the allowed amount to just under $6,000, saying that the attorneys had charged more than $75 per hour and that they had not justified the number of hours worked. He called the GPO behavior "precisely the type of government action that small businesses do not ordinarily have the resources to contest, and the act is therefore intended to prevent."

Photo Data doesn't have the money yet, however, because the GPO is deciding whether to appeal.

Watkins sees the award as a victory for all small businesses. "In the past, rather than fight it, you'd just let the government do what it wanted to do," he said. "Now the law tells the small contractor, 'If you're right and you know you're right, you can afford to fight them.'"

GOOD VICTORY, GOOD LOSS

Sen. Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M., deserves commendation for successfully steering "equal access to justice" legislation through Congress.

But no sympathy should be forthcoming over the sidetracking of his effort to have Uncle Sam pick up the tab for housing New Mexico's homeless prisoners.

The measure that passed will be felt by many Americans. It could be labeled, in time, as the "Little Magna Charta" for its calculated effect of protecting Americans from arbitrary and oppressive government.

The sidetracked measure violates many principles of good government so ably expounded by Sen. Domenici himself—most notably the principle of fiscal responsibility. It is a pork-barrel type measure calculated to benefit New Mexico at the expense of the nation as a whole. It asks the federal government with a chronic budget deficit, to cancel a rightful debt of New Mexico, which enjoys a chronic budget surplus.

The expense of relocating and housing New Mexico prisoners, who were displaced by the disastrous February riot in the state penitentiary, is one of the many small penalties New Mexico must pay for permitting insufferable conditions to develop and persist at the prison. The bitter February lesson will be forgotten before reform can be achieved if someone else can be persuaded to pick up the chips.

Sen. Domenici's "equal access to justice" legislation will permit the courts and federal administrative law judges to require the federal government to pay court costs and legal expenses for those who successfully sue the federal government for administrative wrongs.

It could cause the bureaucracy to think twice before saddling an individual or firm with total assets of less than $1 million with capricious directives or penalties. It also provides a means by which to "fight city hall."

Heretofore, too many individuals and small enterprises have lived with unpleasant governmental orders because of the high cost of fighting back. The "even chance" that the government might bear the cost of litigation will encourage reasonable protests through the courts or by administrative appeal.

By Mr. METZENBAUM:

S. 381. A bill for the relief of Mishleen Earle; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF MISHLEEN EARLE

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, today I introduce this private relief legislation to grant Mishleen Earle permanent residency in the United States. There are no administrative or judicial remedies available to Mrs. Earle and no pending court proceeding to change or adjust her status. I believe the compelling facts surrounding Mrs. Earle's case will merit the granting of permanent residency.

Bryan Earle, a U.S. Navy corpsman serving his country in Lebanon, and Mishleen Abi Ghanem, a young Lebanese citizen, were married in Beirut on October 16, 1983. Two days later the newly married couple arrived at the American Embassy in Beirut where Mr. Earle began to file a petition on his new wife's behalf for permanent residency in the United States. The young couple anticipated that Mishleen would travel to the United States and reside safely there until they could be reunited after Mr. Earle's tour of duty in war-torn Lebanon was completed.

Tragically, Mr. Earle was killed 5 days later in the terrorist bombing of the Marine headquarters in Beirut. Mrs. Earle accompanied her husband's body back to the United States for the funeral services in his hometown of Painesville, OH. She wishes to remain in her husband's country, which he served so bravely. However, the Immigration and Naturalization Office has sadly informed Mishleen that her petition for permanent residency died along with her husband. Also, because she has no immediate relatives who are American citizens and because her visitor's visa had expired, she will have to return to Lebanon and its war unless this legislation is enacted.

Mr. Earle was serving the United States as a member of the peacekeeping force in Beirut. He was not there for his own personal reasons; he was in Lebanon because his duty to his country required him to be there. If he had filed the petition for Mishleen at any Immigration and Naturalization Office in the United States, she would have walked out of that office, that day, with a stamp in her passport authorizing her to remain and work in the United States pending a routine investigation. Instead, the Earles became victims of circumstances, circumstances which neither of them chose. They visited the Embassy to complete the necessary forms. Because of the large number of other persons at the Embassy with their own requests, Mr. Earle collected all the necessary papers for permanent residency and returned to the barracks to complete them. He planned to return them to the Embassy in the coming days. Before he could return the forms, he was killed in the massacre. When his body was found among the rubble of the explosion, the completed papers rested in his pocket.

Mr. President, I introduce this private relief legislation to grant Mrs. Mishleen Earle permanent residency in the United States so that she may have the opportunity and honor of remaining in Bryan Earle's native country that he served with such dignity. This is how he wanted it.●

By Mr. BUMPERS:

S. 382. A bill to amend the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act relating to the standard of eligibility for water and waste facility grants; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

ELIGIBILITY STANDARDS FOR WATER AND WASTE FACILITY GRANTS

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill today that will give the Farmers Home Administration the flexibility to make grant funds for water system construction available to areas where ground water supplies are hopelessly contaminated—even though the areas may be over the grant eligibility median income threshold.

Mr. President, we have a small community in my State, Green Forest, AR, a rural area where the underground water supplies have been contaminated. We have been trying to get a water system for the residents there so they will not have to draw from a polluted underground source. But the Farmers Home Administration cannot make a grant or a loan to them because the service area is over the grant-eligibility median income threshold.

My bill simply says that where there is an urgent health problem the Farmers Home Administration can waive that requirement.

My bill will also direct the Secretary to establish the nonmetropolitan median household income grant-eligibility threshold at no lower than the national poverty level as established by the Office of Management and Budget.

As my colleagues know, since 1981 the Secretary of Agriculture has established grant eligibility guidelines for the Farmers Home Administration water and waste program. Without statutory authorization, the Secretary has developed regulatory guidelines based on the State nonmetropolitan median household income level. Using the latest census figures the Secretary has developed median income levels for each State and has directed each FmHA State office to restrict grant funds to those service areas whose median income level does not exceed 85 percent of the State nonmetropolitan median household income. If a service area believes the established levels for the area to be in error it must prove the median income figure to be in error—a difficult and expensive process.

Other limitations on the availability of grant funds for construction of water and waste systems are that only communities of 10,000 population or less are eligible for assistance, and grant funding cannot exceed 75 percent of the eligible project cost. Yearly items such as interest charges and operation and management costs are not eligible. Currently, regulations do not allow FmHA the discretion to use grant funds for a service area in which the nonmetropolitan median household income exceeds the grant eligibility threshold.

This lack of discretion in the use of grant funds has been a hardship on communities in many areas of the country that are in need of grant assistance to construct water supply systems because of the hopeless contamination of ground water supplies. In Arkansas, the rural area just outside of the city of Green Forest recently suffered an irreversible contamination of ground water supplies caused by sewage discharge of an overburdened sewerage system. A correction of the sewerage system will not solve the ground water contamination problem for the innocent citizens inside of the contamination area.

Their only hope to receive safe drinking, cooking, bathing, and livestock water in the service area is to transfer water through a water system from water supplies outside of the contaminated area. The cost of constructing such a system is huge, completely outside of the ability of the citizens to repay on a loan only basis, so grant funds are essential. However, due to census calculations, the service area barely exceeds the grant-eligible median income threshold and is therefore ineligible for grant assistance.

My bill will give the Farmers Home Administration the discretion to make grant funds available to areas facing a State health emergency, as certified by the State, due to contaminated ground water supplies even if the median income of the area exceeds an eligibility threshold established by the Secretary. This provision will not require an additional appropriation, it only allows the Farmers Home Administration greater authority in using grant moneys already appropriated.

The second provision of my bill requires the Secretary, in establishing grant eligibility criteria using median income guidelines, to set the threshold at no lower than the national poverty level as established by the Office of Management and Budget. Currently four States—Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi and Missouri—have grant-eligible thresholds well below the poverty level. In Arkansas, the State nonmetropolitan median household income level is $11,115. The 85 percent grant-eligible threshold is $9,447 and the national poverty level is $10,200. This anomaly has put many counties, communities and other service areas in Arkansas in the unusual position of making too much to be eligible for grant funds, but not enough to be above the poverty level. My bill will correct this unintended and inequitable operation of the law.

I hope my colleagues will study my bill closely. I believe these provisions are necessary revisions and will go a long way in tailoring program objectives to community needs.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have this bill printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 382

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 306(a)(2) of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1926(a)(2)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "If the Secretary establishes a standard of eligibility for grants made under this paragraph based on the median family income of the persons to be served by the facility, the standard of eligibility established by the Secretary (A) may not require that the median family income of such persons be at a level below the poverty line, as defined in section 673(2) of the Community Services Block Grant Act (42 U.S.C. 9902(2)), and (B) may be waived by the Secretary in the case of any area of a State if the appropriate official or body of the State in which such area is located determines that such facility is necessary to avoid or mitigate the serious contamination of groundwater in such area.".

By Mr. BUMPERS:

S. 383. A bill to authorize appropriations for a highway demonstration project in the vicinity of Fort Smith, AR, that would widen a segment of the Federal-aid urban system and would improve signalization on such segment; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

51-059 O-86-14 (Pt. 2)

WALDRON ROAD PROJECT AUTHORIZATION

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill, which I have introduced before here, that would authorize the highway demonstration project in Fort Smith, AR. Most of my colleagues are familiar with it because I have spoken frequently about it here before.

But it is designed to alleviate one of the gravest traffic congestion areas in the United States.

The people in Fort Smith will never be able to do it by themselves without some help and will allow a very small portion of the highway trust fund to be used for the purpose.

The problem involves monumental traffic tie-ups in Fort Smith, AR, the State's second largest city. Traffic through Fort Smith's busiest commercial section moves at a crawl; accidents are frequent; property damage is heavy; and economic growth in the area is adversely affected. It is a situation which the city and the State are absolutely incapable of dealing with. Authorization of funding for a highway demonstration project in this area is imperative, and I think if my colleagues will listen to an explanation of this proposed project, they will agree that it is extremely deserving of our consideration.

Last October when the Senate debated S. 3024, the Federal Aid Highway Act, I offered an amendment that would have authorized $8.5 million in funding for widening and improving signalization of Waldron Road in Fort Smith, AR. My amendment was already incorporated in the House-passed version of the highway bill. Following assurances from the chairman of the Public Works Committee that the Waldron Road language would receive the Senate conferees serious consideration in conference, I withdrew the amendment. Unhappily, the highway authorization bill stalled in conference and didn't pass before the 98th Congress adjourned. For that reason, I am again introducing legislation to fund the Waldron Road project.

On March 20, 1984, I testified before the Transportation Subcommittee of the Environment and Public Works Committee and made the case for Federal assistance to the Waldron Road project. This crucial project would improve the major north-south route in Fort Smith, AR. Specifically, the project would involve acquiring an 80 foot right-of-way along two major arterial roads—Waldron Road and Grand Avenue; relocating families and businesses which are affected by the acquisition; relocating necessary utilities; widening Waldron Road and Grand Avenue to four, and in some places five lanes; and installing necessary signalization. The total length of the improvements is some 2.03 miles. The cost to complete the project is $8.5 million.

Waldron Road serves the area with the highest concentration of commercial development in Fort Smith. I'm sure that my colleagues are familiar with the typical pattern of suburban development when stores and offices from a city's old downtown move to outlying areas. That is what has happened in Fort Smith, and the result is an area so congested with automobile traffic that it is nearly impossible to enter Waldron Road from either the community college or the businesses and shopping centers that line the route. Two more shopping centers are under construction in the area, which will add to the congestion. Waldron Road also intersects Grand Avenue, which is connected to interstate 540 by an interchange. Traffic entering and exiting interstate 540 at Grand Avenue causes additional traffic problems in the area. The intersection of Waldron Road and Rogers Avenue, also know as Arkansas State Highway 22, is the most congested intersection in Fort Smith, and is one of the most congested in the State of Arkansas.

Another factor contributing to the traffic congestion around Waldron Road is Westark Community College. From 1975 to 1983 enrollment in the community services program increased from 500 to 12,000, or a phenomenal 2,300 percent. During the past 5 to 10 years, very few improvements to Waldron Road have been made for lack of city funds. I think that you can see why Waldron Road is so congested. With the proposed improvements, it is fully anticipated that the traffic problem will be alleviated to a great extent. I can personally attest to the serious nature of the traffic problems in the Waldron Road corridor. My home is only a few miles outside Fort Smith, and the Waldron Road area is where we must go to do our shopping. The congestion is worse than anything I have ever experienced in the Washington area. In the Waldron Road corridor between 1981 and June 1984 there were 249 traffic accidents resulting in 62 personal injuries and $270,340 in property damage. I ask unanimous consent that the following city of Fort Smith official traffic and accident records be included in the RECORD as if Read.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am sure that other Senators know of deserving projects in their States too, but there is something unique about Waldron Road that I hope my colleagues will consider. The city of Fort Smith is simply not eligible for sufficient funds under existing Department of Transportation programs to undertake the necessary improvements to Waldron Road. The project represents 20 to 30 percent of the entire city budget—an amount that the city cannot be expected to commit to a single project. Fort Smith would be forced to use every penny of its urban high density funds for a period of 5 years to complete this project, and other important needs would go unmet. Nevertheless, the project is vital to the safety and economic well-being of the city and surrounding areas.

Mr. President, if any project is deserving of this body's special consideration, it is the Waldron Road project. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 383

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a)

notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Transportation is authorized to carry out a highway project to demonstrate the economic growth and development benefits of—

(1) widening a segment of the Federal-aid urban system that connects a community college and a large commercial center in the vicinity of Fort Smith, Arkansas, and

(2) improving traffic signalization on such segment.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated out of the Highway Trust Fund (other than the Mass Transit Account) for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act an amount not to exceed $8,500,000 for the fiscal year 1985.

(c) Funds authorized by this Act shall be available for obligation by the State of Arkansas in the same manner and to the same extent as if such funds were apportioned to such State under chapter 1 of title 23, United States Code, and such funds shall remain available until expended.

(d) Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the project authorized by this Act shall not be subject to any obligation limitation.

(e) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Federal share payable for the project authorized by this Act shall be 100 percent of the total cost of such project.

By Mr. BUMPERS:

S. 384. A bill to authorize appropriations for a highway demonstration project on U.S. Highway 71 between Alma, AR, and Bella Vista, AR, that would increase the number of lanes on this segment of the route from two to four; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

DEMONSTRATION PROJECT FOR U.S. HIGHWAY 71 IN ARKANSAS

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill today that has been popularly referred to as the Highway 71 project which would authorize the widening and improvement of U.S. Highway 71, the most important primary road in northwest Arkansas.

Our State has made an effort to widen this highway to four lands from Interstate 40 north to Fayetteville. Unfortunately, we will never be able to do it with available funds at the local level.

This bill has been introduced here before, and I recognize the budget strains we are going to be suffering this year. But I am offering these bills because they are absolutely critical to the economic future of my State.

My State desperately needs Federal assistance to widen this major north-south highway through the Ozark Mountains. It provides to a mushrooming population in the Ozark resort region of Arkansas and Missouri the primary access to interstate I-40, which bisects Arkansas between Fort Smith in the west and Memphis, TN, in the east.

In the past 10 years, we in Arkansas undertook in our limited way with limited means to do something about the problem of Highway 71, but we will never be able to handle this project alone. This bill would make limited funds available from the highway trust fund so that a new Highway 71 could be built. The Arkansas Highway and Transportation Department proposes to widen Highway 71 from two to four lanes.

Highway 71 is already eligible for interstate 4-R funds, but most of Arkansas' allotment of 4-R funds is already allocated to repair projects on existing interstate mileage. With the combination of interstate 4-R funds, regular Federal-aid highway funds, State moneys and the assistance provided by this bill, the State of Arkansas will be able to carry out the needed improvements to Highway 71. This legislation will provide funds for preliminary engineering, design, right-of-way acquisition, and relocation activities in connection with the project.

The Ozark region is the fastest growing area in Arkansas and one of the fastest growing regions in the country. Between 1970 and 1980, the permanent population of the four counties in which Highway 71 is located increased from 232,800 to 310,780. The projected population in 1990 is 382,231. By the year 2004, it is estimated that these four counties alone will have 551,900 inhabitants. Visitors to the region combined with residents of adjacent counties account for many times those numbers.

The University of Arkansas' main campus at Fayetteville is also served by Highway 71. As a parent, I can tell my colleagues that I have worried every time my children have traveled that route. Highway 71 serves a very mountainous area, making travel difficult at best in good weather and very hazardous in rain, fog, and ice. The Arkansas Highway and Transportation Department rates the level of service on Highway 71 "D," on a scale of "A" to "F"—"A" being the best and "F" the worst. The highway is one steep grade after another for approximately 90 miles. The average speed on those grades is 10 to 20 miles per hour. Highway 71 serves an average of 11,000 vehicles per day. The average number of vehicles served on a comparable U.S. Highway in Arkansas is 3,600. Twenty-one percent of the vehicles using Highway 71 on a given day are heavy trucks. This last statistic helps account for the hair-raising accident figures on the road. Fatal accidents on Highway 71 are five times the statewide average of 1.9 per 100 million vehicle-miles traveled. Between 1980 and 1982 there were 8 fatal accidents causing 16 deaths.

Last October when the Senate debated S. 3024, the Federal Aid Highway Act, I offered an amendment that would have authorized $25 million in funding over a 2-year period for Highway 71. My amendment was already incorporated in the House-passed version of the highway bill. Following assurances from the chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee that the Highway 71 language would receive the Senate conferees' serious consideration in conference, I withdrew the amendment. Unhappily, the highway authorization bill stalled in conference and didn't pass before the 98th Congress adjourned. For that reason, I am again introducing legislation to fund the Highway 71 improvements.

Mr. President, if any project is deserving of this body's special consideration, it is the Highway 71 project. I urge my colleagues to lend their support to this legislation, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 384

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Transportation is authorized to carry out a highway project in the State of Arkansas on a segment of a north-south highway on the Federal-aid primary system from the vicinity of the junction of Interstate routes I-40 and I-540 to the boundary between the States of Arkansas and Missouri in the vicinity of Bella Vista, Arkansas, for the purpose of demonstrating methods of improving highway safety and accelerating highway construction. Such project shall increase the number of lanes on such segment from two to four.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated out of the Highway Trust Fund (other than the Mass Transit Account) for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this Act an amount not to exceed $10,000,000 for fiscal year 1986, and not to exceed $15,000,000 for fiscal year 1987.

(c) Funds authorized to be appropriated by this Act shall be available for obligation by the State of Arkansas in the same manner and to the same extent as if such funds were apportioned to such State under chapter 1 of title 23, United States Code, and such funds shall remain available until expended.

(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the project authorized by this Act shall not be subject to any obligation limitation.

(e) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Federal share payable for the project authorized by this Act shall be 100 percent of the total cost of such project.

S. 386. A bill to confirm a conveyance of certain real property by the Southern Pacific Transportation Co. to Ernest Pritchett and his wife, Dianna Pritchett; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN PROPERTY

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, today I am pleased to introduce legislation to confirm a conveyance of land from Southern Pacific Railroad to Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Pritchett of Rogue River, OR.

In 1978, the Pritchetts purchased a mobile home park in Rogue River. The park is located alongside a fence erected long ago by the railroad. It was assumed that the fence marked the boundary of the Southern Pacific's land. In 1981, Mr. and Mrs. Pritchett discovered that part of their park was actually owned by Southern Pacific.

Southern Pacific has now transferred the land to the Pritchetts. However, because the land was part of an old Federal land grant to the railroad, Congress must confirm the conveyance. The bill I am introducing today, will do that.●

S. 387. A bill to require the establishment of a national cemetery on the island of Oahu in the State of Hawaii; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL CEMETERY ON THE ISLAND OF OAHU

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, today my colleague, Senator MATSUNAGA, and I have introduced legislation to require that the Veterans Administration develop a national cemetery on the island of Oahu in the State of Hawaii.

The National Cemetery of the Pacific in Punchbowl Crater on the island of Oahu serves today as the final resting place for more than 29,000 American veterans together with their wives and dependents. As anyone who has visited there well knows, it is a moving and appropriate tribute. Its existence and beauty is also a promise kept to those who have served our country.

Later this year, the last available burial space at Punchbowl will have been filled. Thereafter, veterans who wish to be buried in the Punchbowl national cemetery will have to be interred in Riverside, CA—2,500 miles and half an ocean away—because it is the current policy of the Veterans Administration that no national cemeteries will be begun or expanded except for regional cemeteries such as the one in existence in Riverside.

This policy may impose a substantial inconvenience upon residents of the noncontiguous States. In practice, it will absolutely preclude veterans from Hawaii, or those who would choose to be buried there, from resting finally in what we have recognized by statute to be among our "national shrines as a tribute to our gallant dead."

Mr. President, I do not believe this to be right. I have therefore introduced and urge my colleagues to support this legislation which will do no more than compel the Veterans Administration to recognize geographic reality and satisfy a debt owed to those who have served our Nation.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the measure be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 387

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall (1) establish a national cemetery on the island of Oahu in the State of Hawaii at such location as he determines most appropriate, and (2) acquire by donation, purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, such land as may be required for the establishment of such cemetery, but not less land than is necessary to provide for 22,000 full casket burial grave sites.

SEC. 2. The national cemetery established under authority of this Act shall become part of the National Cemetery System and shall be administered in accordance with the provisions of chapter 24 of title 38, United States Code.

SEC. 3. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.●

By Mrs. KASSEBAUM:

S. 388. A bill to amend the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act to establish a debt adjustment program for guaranteed loans, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

HOMESTEAD PROTECTION ACT

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I join my colleagues in focusing attention on the real and very immediate crisis in the farm credit sector. It has become increasingly clear that something must be done to assist farmers and private lenders in providing the financing necessary to thousands of America's farmers. Today I will introduce legislation which provides such assistance

Mr. President, this legislation offers a temporary cushion for efficient and well-managed farmers, allowing them to survive the ongoing transition in our agricultural economy. The administration plans to ease the farm credit crunch soon. Although that plan may include provisions found in the legislation I introduce today, I believe it will be inadequate to meet the needs of the farm economy. What America's farmers need is a farm credit plan that meshes with the realities of today. Discussions with farmers, bankers, and economists in my home State have convinced me that more assistance is necessary than the administration is prepared to provide. Though I welcome the administration's apparent recognition that the crisis is real and worsening, I cannot embrace a program that offers too little assistance and too little hope.

I believe my legislative program can work. It is not a bail out. It is not a charity commitment by the Government. It is a balanced program, a reasonable program, which calls upon the best efforts of private lenders, farmers, and ranchers, and the Government. In return for a short-term Federal Guarantee, bankers will agree to write down, take a loss on, certain farm operating and farm ownership loans. Farmers will have to restructure their debt and their farming operations in order to assure both the bank and the Farmers Home Administration that they can service their debt, pay production costs, and feed and clothe their families. The Federal Government will provide loan guarantees to encourage banks to renegotiate farm loans. And these guarantess are phased out over time, shifting the economic risks over time to the private sector.

Mr. President, the stark reality facing the farm sector cannot be ignored. High interest rates make it difficult or impossible for many farmers to finance debt repayments out of current income. The percentage of production costs attributable to interest on debt has risen from 7.6 percent in 1970 to nearly 16 percent in 1983. Macroeconomic policies of the United States have dramatically strengthened the U.S. dollar, making U.S. agricultural exports more expensive and slowing the growth in the economics of developing countries. Low commodity prices and successive years of weather problems have compounded the problems of numerous farmers.

These general observations are buttressed by other, more dramatic data. Farmers are being forced out of business in extraordinary numbers. In the 10th Federal Reserve District during the second and third quarters of 1984, 4.5 percent of the district's farmers went out of business because of financial stress—2.8 times the number bankers considered normal. Partial liquidation reflected a similar story. Agricultural banks posted loan loss rates five times as great in 1983 as in 1979, and bank profits, measured by returns to equity, have fallen sharply; 25 agricultural banks failed during 1984, and hundreds are considered by Federal regulators as troubled; 30 percent of Farmers Home Administration borrowers were delinquent in their loan payments. Production Credit Association losses for 1984 are expected to total $250 million, compared with only $109 million for the entire decade of the 1970's. Federal land banks are also threatened, as equity in land is rapidly dissipated by declining land values.

These are not local or regional problems. The proportion of highly leveraged farmers—those in the greatest financial difficulties—with debt-to-asset ratios over 70 percent, exceeds the national average in the Great Lakes States, the Northern Plains, the Appalachians, the Southeast, the Delta States, the Southern Plains, and the Rocky Mountain States. When farmers with over 40-percent debt-to-asset ratios are included, the Northeast and the Corn Belt States join those areas with leverage above the national average. This is a crisis of national proportion.

Mr. President, this is a national responsibility, and one which can only be fulfilled by the National Government. It cannot be fulfilled at no cost, and given the seriousness of our Federal budget problems, no magic wand can be waved to produce billions of dollars for the farm economy. We can, however, underscore the Federal Government's concern for and commitment to a stable farm economy and a stable flow of food and fiber to our citizens.

This is not a welfare program for farmers. We will not save all farmers. We will not save all rural or agricultural banks. And we will not reverse totally the confusion and turmoil in rural communities. We can, though, cushion these blows and preserve a structure and a way of life which has served this country well for over 200 years.

Mr. President, the Federal Government has enacted policies to protect many industries in the United States, from agriculture, to steel, to textiles, to automobiles, and shoes. Often the cost of the protections is not evident to the American consumer, citizen, taxpayer. Voluntary agreements now being finalized to restrict the importation of foreign steel will cost an estimated $18 billion over the next 5 years. Voluntary restriction on the importation of Japanese automobiles has cost the American consumer an estimated $10 billion over its 4-year period. Limitations on the importation of textiles have cost consumers billions of dollars as well.

Mr. President, my point is not to challenge here those types of protection for American industry and American jobs. My point is to emphasize that Federal assistance to agriculture is the most visible and open assistance given any industry in this country. It is visible to the taxpayer and open to the debate, advocacy, and criticism of the democratic process. We and the American people can measure the cost and understand the commitment of the Government. This is not always true with Government protection programs.

I think the program I am introducing will withstand the scrutiny of the Federal taxpayer and policymaker. It is limited. It is a partnership. It is vital to the agricultural sector of the economy, which touches one of every five jobs in this country.

Mr. President, in conclusion, something must be done. While we may not be able to save every individual farmer, it is essential that the Government not allow thousands of efficient family farms to be pushed into bankruptcy. If this is allowed to happen, as it clearly will under present policies and conditions, then we face a profound ripple effect as more agricultural banks fail and the health of rural communities is further eroded.

The legislation will expand on the debt restructuring program announced by the administration last September. The worthy goals of that program have proven unattainable. For various reasons, only a minute portion of credit-desperate farmers have participated in that program. Private lenders and farmers have been faced with unrealistic eligibility requirements, unnecessary paperwork, and unproductive delays. My legislation supplements the September program, building on its foundation a program which profits from the lessons of the past few months. I sincerely believe the modifications I have suggested are necessary if we are to preserve the financial, economic, and social network of our farm States. This program entails a commitment by the Government. However, that commitment is neither open-ended, nor is it unreasonable. It will require the best effort of farmers, lenders, and the Government, but it can succeed.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to study the six points of my program which follow my statement, ask questions, and discover its potential. I welcome support for this plan, and I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for the opportunity to discuss the farm credit situation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill and a summary of its provisions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 388

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Homestead Protection Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. The Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1921 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 349. (a) The Secretary shall establish and carry out in accordance with this section a debt adjustment program for real estate loans and operating loans guaranteed under this title.

"(b) The Secretary shall guarantee a real estate loan or operating loan under this title made by a legally organized lending institution to a borrower if—

"(1) the lender—

"(A) cancels at least 10 per centum of the total principal and interest outstanding on such loan and all other real estate and operating loans owed the lender by the borrower and guaranteed under this title; or

"(B) reduces the interest rate on such real estate or operating loan by an amount which, over the remaining term of the loan, would reduce by at least 10 per centum the total principal and interest outstanding on such loan and all other real estate and operating loans owed the lender by the borrower and guaranteed under this title; and

"(2) the borrower—

"(A) demonstrates to the Secretary that the total estimated cash income to be received by the borrower during the twelve month period beginning on the date the loan guarantee contract is entered into (including all farm and non-farm income) will equal or exceed the total estimated cash expenses to be incurred by the borrower during such period (including all farm and non-farm expenses); and

"(B) meets the other eligibility requirements prescribed under this title for the guarantee of such real estate or operating loan.

"(c)(1) During the thirty-six month period beginning on the date the loan guarantee contract is entered into, the Secretary may not guarantee under this title the repayment of more 90 per centum of the principal and interest on a real estate loan or operating loan.

"(2) During the twelve month period following the period referred to in paragraph (1), and each succeeding twelve month period, the percentage of principal and interest on a loan guaranteed under this title during any such period shall equal the percentage guaranteed during the period immediately preceding such period, reduced by 10 percentage points.

"(3) If the reduction required under paragraph (2) would reduce such percentage to 10 per centum or less, the Secretary shall cease the guarantee of the repayment of the principal and interest on such loan.

"(d) In order to expedite the guarantee of real estate and operating loans for borrowers under this title, the Secretary shall—

"(1) permit applications for the guarantee of such loans to be submitted directly to State offices of the Farmers Home Administration;

"(2) provide such employees, equipment, and assistance to such State offices as are necessary to expedite the processing of such applications;

"(3) expedite the processing of applications of lenders for participation in the approved lender program established by exhibit A to subpart B of part 1980 of title 7, Code of Federal Regulations, and give priority review to such applications; and

"(4) target the assignment of employees of the Farmers Home Administration to those States with the greatest need for farm credit assistance, as measured by the number of requests received for such assistance, the amount of farm debt incurred by borrowers, the proportion of debts to assets of borrowers, the availability of such assistance in the absence of such guarantee, and such other factors as the Secretary determines appropriate.

"(e) The Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve Board shall by regulation provide that—

"(1) a loan which is guaranteed in accordance with this section shall not be considered a problem loan, except under extraordinary circumstances; and

"(2) in the case of a loan which is secured by a title to farm real estate held by a lender, the amount of such loan which is considered a problem loan shall be limited to the difference between the total amount of principal and interest due on such loan and the current fair market value of such real estate.".

HOMESTEAD PROTECTION ACT—SUMMARY

Allow lenders to write down interest rates on farm loans in exchange for federal guarantees on the principal. Currently, lenders are not allowed to substitute a lower rate of interest and instead are permitted to write down principal only.

Allow farmers to be eligible for the program if they can break even under the new guidelines. Current regulations require that farmers have a "positive cash flow" of 10 percent above costs.

Increase the authorized level of available federal guarantees from the current $630 million to $4 billion.

Allow a gradual but steady reduction of the federal loan guarantee percentage over a period of years. Currently, the guarantee percentage remains fixed over the entire term of the note.

Ease government pressure on commercial lenders by eliminating the classification of renegotiated loans with a federal guarantee as "problem" loans. The Kassebaum plan encourages the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and other government agencies to change regulations that currently discourage agricultural lenders from renegotiating loans and pressure lenders to place land on an already-flooded market.

Direct the Farmers Home Administration to make available additional field personnel and equipment—in areas where they are most needed—to speed up the processing of loan applications under the new program.

By Mr. INOUYE (for himself and Mr. MATSUNAGA):

S. 389. A bill to clarify procedures for the disposal of Federal lands for use for public airport purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

AIRPORT AND AIRWAY IMPROVEMENT ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, this morning my colleague, Senator MATSUNAGA, and I have introduced a measure to amend the Airport and Airways Improvement Act of 1982, and section 13g of the Surplus Property Act of 1944, to correct what we believe to be an improper interpretation of those sections of the law relating to the transfer of Federal property to State and local jurisdictions for airport development purposes.

Section 516 of the Airport Act, 49 U.S.C. 2215, compels the transfer of Federal lands suitable for airport development to State and local governments upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Transportation if such a use would not be inconsistent with needs of the Federal agency in control of the property. This mechanism is, of course, designed to facilitate the orderly development of local airports in accordance with Federal needs and priorities.

Section 13g of the Surplus Property Act of 1944, in the context of the existing statutory scheme for the disposition of such property, provides the Administrator of the General Services Administration with the authority to transfer surplus Federal property to State and local governments for airport development purposes. Both the Secretary of Transportation and Administrator of the General Services Administration are thus apparently provided with the power to transfer property for the purposes of airport development.

This overlapping authority has resulted in unnecessary conflict and confusion. Specifically, the General Services Administration has refused to conduct a transfer which had been requested by the Department of Transportation because the property involved had been declared surplus. In its defense, the GSA argued that the transfer provisions of the Surplus Property Act superseded the terms of the Airport Act so that any Federal property declared surplus fell within the exclusive jurisdiction of the GSA. The result of such an interpretation is that States and localities which comply with the provisions of the Airport Act may be deprived of intended benefits under the act because of the conflicting requirements and policies of the GSA. This is, in fact, precisely the situation which arose in Hawaii. The transfer in that case was ultimately accomplished after the filing of a suit in Federal court, congressional intervention, and extended negotiations. But the underlying confusion, statutory ambiguity and potential for unfairness remains.

The bill we have introduced today makes it clear that it was the intention of Congress that the Department of Transportation have the authority to transfer Federal property for airport development purposes whether or not such property has been declared surplus. The language of the 1982 act could not have been clearer in this respect. It provides that upon recommendation of the Secretary of Transportation, the department or agency head in control of desired Federal property is authorized and directed to transfer unneeded parcels. The GSA is not exempted and no exception is made for surplus property. I believe that it was the intention of Congress that issues regarding the wisdom of transferring unneeded Federal lands for airport development should rest principally with the Department of Transportation. This bill merely clarifies that intent.

A second element of the law addressed in this bill involves the present necessity that the Attorney General approve all transfers under the Airport Act. In defense of its position the GSA asserted in Federal court that the inclusion of the Attorney General provided him with absolute discretion over the transfers of such property. They therefore argued that no State or locality may legally complain of a failed transfer under the Airport Act if the Attorney General, for any reason, failed to approve of a DOT recommendation.

The context and history of the statute in question appears to undermine the argument that the Attorney General was ever intended to have the absolute discretion to veto a DOT-recommended transfer. Indeed, the President of the United States formally delegated his approval authority under the 1970 version of the act to the Secretary of Transportation and was removed altogether under the 1982 reenactment of the statute. Under these circumstances, I believe that it is clear that Congress intended that the Attorney General perform no more than the essentially ministerial duties of assuring conformity with existing law. I know of no reason why this function cannot be performed adequately by the Department of Transportation and therefore recommend that the role of the Attorney General in this process be deleted in order to clarify and streamline the procedures involved.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of our proposal be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

S. 389

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a)(1) the second sentence of subsection (b) of section 516 of the Airport and Airway Improvement Act of 1982 (49 U.S.C. 2215 (b)) is amended—

(A) by striking out "is hereby authorized and directed, with the approval of the Attorney General of the United States, and" and inserting in lieu thereof "shall,";

(B) by striking out "to" before "perform any acts"; and

(C) by striking out "to" before "execute any instruments".

(2) Such section is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) Applicability of Surplus Property Act.—The provisions of section 13 (g) of the Surplus Property Act of 1944 shall not apply to any conveyance of land under this section.".

(b) Section 13 (g) of the Surplus Property Act of 1944 (50 U.S.C. App. 1622(g)) is amended at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(7) The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to any conveyance of land under section 516 of the Airport and Airway Improvement Act of 1982 (49 U.S.C. 2215).".●

S.J. Res. 37. Joint resolution to reaffirm U.S. solidarity with the aspirations of captive nations in Central and Eastern Europe by repudiating the negative consequences of the 1945 Yalta executive agreements; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPUDIATION OF NEGATIVE CONSEQUENCES OF THE YALTA AGREEMENTS

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, 40 years ago yesterday, a meeting began in the Crimean resort city of Yalta that was to have immense consequences for the freedom of Eastern Europe, and the security of the West.

The Yalta conference produced a series of executive agreements that, in effect, established Soviet domination of Eastern and Central Europe, resulted in the enslavement of millions of people, and even today provides a justification for inaction in the face of Communist offenses against human rights in those regions.

In commemoration of this anniversary, I am reintroducing my legislation from last year that calls upon Congress to repudiate the consequences of the Yalta executive agreements. By reintroducing this joint resolution, I am acting in the spirit of President Dwight D. Eisenhower, who stated in his message to Congress of February 2, 1953, that he would ask that body to join in "making it clear that we would never acquiesce in the enslavement of any people in order to purchase fancied gain for ourselves, and that we would not feel that any past agreement committed us to any enslavement." I am acting in the spirit of Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Carter's National Security Advisor, who has called for a repudiation of the Yalta agreements in a recent Foreign Affairs article. And I am acting in the spirit of Secretary of State George Shultz, who, speaking at the Stockholm Conference on European Disarmament last year, said, "the United States does not recognize the legitimacy of the artificially imposed division of Europe." That division of Europe has as its basis the Yalta agreement.

I do not question the motives of the Western leaders who negotiated this agreement with Stalin in 1945. After all, the Red Army already controlled much of Eastern Europe at the time of the meeting, and the Western leaders believed that by acquiescing temporarily to Soviet control of this region, they could extract valuable concessions from Stalin. History has proven them wrong. But the reasons for repudiating Yalta has less to do with questioning these political judgments than with the fact that Yalta has become, like Munich, a symbol of the inability of liberal democracies to stand up to a totalitarian power, and a willingness to abandon friends and principles.

Equally important, the Yalta agreements are contrary not only to the great founding principles of this Nation, but also to the Atlantic Charter which established the goals of the Allies in World War II.

Both the Atlantic Charter and the founding principles of this Nation stress the idea of self-determination. But there was no self-determination at Yalta. The representatives of the peoples whose fates were being determined were not even consulted. Instead, the future of millions of people was laid out on the basis of geographical location alone.

The Soviet Union looks to Yalta to justify its domination of Central and Eastern Europe. Therefore, to repudiate Yalta would make it clear that we do not accept the forcible division of Europe. To repudiate Yalta would make it clear to the Soviet Union—and to our allies—that cooperation with the U.S.S.R. will not be at the expense of the subjugated people of central and Eastern Europe. And to repudiate Yalta would send a message to those subjugated people that we have not forgotten them.

The repudiation of Yalta is, of course, a symbolic act and it should not be seen as a substitute for substantive economic and political pressure on the Soviet Empire. But the renunciation of Yalta is an important symbolic act in which the same way that the Emancipation Proclamation was an important symbolic act. Just as the Emancipation Proclamation gave hope to those who languished in slavery before they were actually freed, so the repudiation of Yalta is intended to give hope to the people of the Soviet bloc.

Mr. President, last year the Foreign Relations Committee was on record as calling for hearings on this resolution. I concur: I hope that hearings can be held at the earliest moment possible and that the Senate can send a clear message to the people of central and Eastern Europe that we have not written off their hopes and aspirations for a better world. I hope that all my colleagues will join me in this effort.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point, along with copies of articles by George Will, Adam Ulam, and Zbigniew Brzezinski; and a memorandum on Yalta by the Polish Government-in-exile.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 37

Whereas, during World War II, representatives of the United States, Britain, and the Soviet Union took part in agreements and understandings concerning other peoples who were not represented;

Whereas, the Soviet Union violated the Yalta guarantee of free elections in the countries involved, specifically the Yalta agreement commitment "to form interim intergovernmental authorities broadly representative of all democratic elements in the population and pledge to the earliest possible establishment of free elections of government responsive to the wills of the people and to facilitate where necessary the holdings of such elections;"

Whereas, at Yalta it was decided that a new Polish government should be formed using an unpopular Soviet backed Provisional Government as a base which was to expand on a broader democratic basis with the inclusion of democratic leaders from Poland itself and from Poles abroad, and was to hold free elections, provisions which the Soviets violated by arresting or executing democratic leaders while holding fraudulent elections;

Whereas, at the Yalta Conference, it was agreed to repatriate all Soviet citizens who remained abroad after the war, irrespective of their individual wishes and by force if necessary, resulting in much tragedy and suffering;

Whereas, millions of people around the world, especially those residing in Central and Eastern Europe believe the 1945 Yalta executive agreement involved alleged United States acquiescence in the enslavement of entire nations under a Soviet totalitarian system of government;

Whereas, the nations of Central and Eastern Europe continue to resist Soviet domination as for example in guerrilla wars after World War II in Lithuania, Ukraine, and other countries, in East Berlin 1953, Poznan and Budapest 1956, Prague in 1968 and in Poland 1970 and again since 1980;

Whereas it is appropriate for the United States according to the principles on which this nation was founded to respect the desires and aspirations of all freedom-loving people around the world;

Whereas it is appropriate that the United States express the hopes of the people of the United States for the freedom of the people subjected to the captivity of Soviet despotism in Central and Eastern Europe as well as elsewhere around the world; and

Whereas it is appropriate for the United States to reject any interpretation or application that, as a result of the signing of the 1945 Yalta executive agreements the United States accepts the present position of nations being held captive by the Soviet Union. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States does not recognize as legitimate any spheres of influence in Europe and that it reaffirms its refusal to recognize such spheres in the present or in the future, by repudiating the negative consequences of the Yalta executive agreements of 1945.

That the United States proclaims the hope that the people who have been subjected to the captivity of Soviet despotism shall again enjoy the right to self-determination within a framework that will sustain peace, that they shall again have the right to choose a form of government under which they shall live, and that the sovereign rights of self-determination shall be restored to them in accordance with the pledge of the Atlantic Charter.

The United States hereby expresses its solidarity with the peoples of Central and Eastern Europe.

YALTA'S FALSE PROMISE

(By George F. Will)

Four decades of fraud are enough. The coincidence of the historical calendar and the quickening pace of what is called U.S.-Soviet "dialogue" make this the moment for the United States to denounce the agreements entered into 40 years ago at Yalta.

These words open a chapter in the final volume of Churchill's history of the war: "As the weeks passed after Yalta it became clear that the Soviet government was doing nothing to carry out our agreements. . . ." Churchill was referring especially to Poland, on whose behalf Britain had gone to war in 1939, when the Soviet Union was Hitler's ally.

In February 1945 the Soviet Union began sealing Poland from Western eyes and destroying democratic elements. There were fewer of those elements than there might have been. When the Polish resistance rose in Warsaw against the Germans, the Soviet army loitered on the outskirts of the city to allow the Nazis to massacre the Polish freedom fighters, who would have been inconvenient for the arriving Soviet totalitarians. The Soviet Union compounded its crime by even refusing to allow U.S. and British planes to land in Soviet-held territory after dropping supplies to the Polish resistance. This was six months before Yalta.

The Yalta conference ended Feb. 11, 1945. On Feb. 27, Andrei Vyshinsky, the satanic prosecutor at the 1930s Moscow show "trials," arrived in Bucharest, Romania, to demand that King Michael dismiss the all-party government. The next day, Churchill wrote, Vyshinsky returned to the king, "banged his fist on the table, shouted for an immediate acquiescence, and walked out of the room, slamming the door. At the same time Soviet tanks and troops deployed in the streets of the capital, and on March 2 a Soviet-nominated administration took office."

The Yalta agreements "binding" the allies to work for open societies in Eastern Europe were, at best, forlorn attempts to blunt Soviet bayonets with parchment. It took six days for them to be revealed as an empty pretense.

Yalta did not "give" Eastern Europe to the Soviet Union. The Red Army took it. But Yalta codified the West's wishful thinking about the Soviet Union. The latest Shultz-Gromyko session, like the arms control process generally, is another manifestation of the hope that if the Soviet Union can be talked into talking, and into adopting the forms of orderly relations, then the substance of such relations will somehow follow.

Perhaps we should periodically enter into agreements like those signed at Yalta or, 30 years later, at Helsinki, if only for what they can teach. That is, such agreements can be useful because of the lesson that can be extracted from the instant and comprehensive Soviet violation of them. The problem is that Western governments wind up teaching their publics precisely, the wrong lesson. They refuse to teach the lesson by denouncing the agreements. Instead they convince themselves and their publics that there is something inherently wholesome in the mere "process" of producing agreements.

It may be argued that denouncing the Yalta agreements would be an empty gesture. Not true. It would be an act of public pedagogy, underscoring a lesson at a pregnant moment.

Plans are now being made for commemorating the 40th anniversary of the end of the war in Europe, and there is a revival of the sort of sentimentalism that helped produce Yalta. Today the sentimentalism is, "We were friends then, so . . ." "Friends," forsooth. In 1945 the sentimentalism took the form of the belief that the Soviet regime (which can claim legitimacy only as the enemy of bourgeois democracies) would desire in peace a continuation of the cooperative relationship that served it well in war.

In 1985, the anniversary of V-E day will be an appropriate moment for commemorating the fact that the Soviet Union began the war as Hitler's enthusiastic ally. It was convinced that Hitler would destroy England and other decadent bourgeois democracies, and was eager for that outcome. Hitler initiated the rupture with the Soviet Union, which then received enough aid from the decadent bourgeois democracies that it could survive and become the legatee of Hitlerite values—conquest, totalitarianism, anti-Semitism.

This June will mark the 10th anniversary of the Helsinki agreements on human rights. Those agreements are extensions of the Yalta agreements, but are even less defensible because they came after 30 years of experience with the Yalta agreements. Under the Helsinki agreements the Soviet Union undertook to stop being the Soviet Union—that is, to be minimally civilized.

It has, of course, declined to do that. So 1985 is the year also to denounce the Helsinki agreements. A decade of fraud is enough.

FORTY YEARS AFTER YALTA

(By Adam B. Ulam)

STALIN OUTWITTED FDR, AND THE WEST STILL PAYS

The shadow of Yalta still hovers over Europe. When Solidarity was repressed in December 1981, the chancellor of West Germany, Helmut Schmidt, excused the Polish Communist regime's action by citing the alleged fact that the United States, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union had agreed at Yalta that East Europe should be a Soviet-Communist preserve.

Especially to East Europeans, the word Yalta—the former Crimean resort of the Russian imperial family—has a sinister ring, just like the word Munich. As at Munich in 1938, Western democracies at Yalta in 1945 retreated under pressure from a totalitarian power, and pusillanimously abandoned their friends and principles. Forty years later, there is still neither peace nor war in Europe.

The indictment continues: the dereliction of Great Britain, and especially of the United States, had nefarious consequences for countries outside Europe as well. It was in the Crimea that the Western powers asked—quite needlessly, it turned out—for Soviet help in the war against Japan. And they had no compunction about promising to compensate the Soviets for this help mostly at the expense of their absent Chinese ally. And thus at the price of a few days' fighting, the Soviet Union was able, six months later, to render significant help to Mao which later enabled his forces to conquer the Chinese mainland. The Soviets' brief intervention in the Far Eastern war also led to Communist rule in North Korea, with dire consequences for the world.

For many, even in this country, and not only on the right, it was at Yalta that the United States lost the peace. The ailing president was maneuvered by Stalin into agreements that destroyed hopes for a really peaceful and orderly postwar world.

During its brief flowering, the revisionist school presented a drastically different version of Yalta. American diplomacy at the conference, far from being naive and ill-informed, was judicious and alert. Far from frittering away the fruits of victory, the United States laid there the foundations of what could have been a stable and equitable peace based on mutual trust between East and West. After FDR's death, however, American policymakers repudiated the spirit of Yalta, and attempted to deny the Soviets the deserved fruits of the joint victory. Those anti-Soviet policies, in turn, increased Moscow's feeling of insecurity, provoking repression at home and in East Europe, and an ominous isolationist attitude toward the West. Hence the cold war.

Who is right? For a start, it is important to recall the background of the week-long conference, which opened 40 years ago on February 4. The war against Germany had been all but won. Surrender was expected, perhaps within weeks. There was no doubt that Japan also would be defeated, but the end of the Pacific war was not yet in sight.

Roosevelt, Churchill, and Stalin met at Yalta for two major reasons. First, there was a need to resolve disputes over the postwar settlement on the continent, and over the projected organizational framework and powers of the United Nations. Second, the United States felt it was imperative to bring Russia into the war against Japan.

In hindsight, of course, Soviet intervention was unnecessary. But in February 1945, the United States could not be absolutely sure that the fission bomb would work, still less that it would prove to be the frightful weapon that would abruptly terminate the Pacific war. The only way to compel Tokyo to surrender, Washington believed, was through a massive land invasion of the Japanese homeland, mounted after the finale in Europe. The Joint Chiefs of Staff firmly believed that the Soviet Union ought to be brought into the war, to reduce a potentially huge cost in American lives, and to shorten the final phase of the conflict.

As to the other topics of the conference, each of the three chief participants brought his special anxieties. President Roosevelt was mainly concerned about the U.N. He worried that the Soviet Union might still refuse to join, or would do so only on conditions that would make the world organization, like the late League of Nations, ineffectual and unacceptable to the American public. If so, Roosevelt feared, the United States might revert to isolationism and peace might be ephemeral, as after 1919. To induce Stalin to go along with his plans for the U.N., Roosevelt was ready to go quite far in conceding to Soviet views about Germany and Poland. He also was eager to dispel any suspicion his host might have that the Western powers were "ganging up" on the Soviet Union over the postwar settlement.

Churchill's worries centered on Europe. Great Britain had fought for more than two centuries against the domination of the continent by a single power, something which now threatened to happen. And that danger would increase if Germany was permanently enfeebled, while all of East and Southeast Europe found itself behind what he later called the iron curtain. It was agreed at the conference that after the victory, Germany would be divided into occupation zones, yet no one, including Stalin, could have anticipated that 40 years later, the country would still be partitioned.

Earlier, at the Big Three meeting at Teheran in November 1943, it had been tenatively agreed that Poland should be compensated, at the cost of Germany, for those Polish territories the Soviet Union had acquired under the Molotov-Ribbentrop agreement, and which it now proposed to retain. Churchill, who then had incautiously agreed to "move Poland" westward, now contemplated with a sinking heart the probable consequences of such a move, Germany would be stripped of some of its richest agricultural land and much of its mining wealth. Seven or eight million ethnically German refugees would become an intolerable burden on the rest of the truncated country. Its economy would be crippled for decades, with ominous consequences for Western Europe, and with communism the likely beneficiary.

Stalin managed to keep his own worries to himself. The main one was how debilitated the Soviet Union would be compared to the United States. His nation already had lost 20 million lives and its economy was in a shambles. It could not be expected to recover for at least a decade. In contrast, the war had catalyzed the enormous military and economic power of the United States, which would emerge from the conflict barely scratched, with its industrial output accounting for more than half of the entire world's.

Stalin's negotiating tactics might be best described in military terms: you attack your protagonist at a crucial spot, break through, and then, by unremitting pressure there and feints and diversions elsewhere along the front, you enlarge the bridgehead until the opponent calls a retreat. Then comes the time for an offensive all along the line.

At Teheran the Soviets had established such a bridgehead, on the most contentious and crucial issue at Yalta: that of "moving" Poland. After that it was no longer a question merely of Poland's future borders, but also of its government. In 1943 the Soviet Union had broken off relations with the legitimate Polish government in London. When the Soviet armies reached Poland, the Kremlin installed a group of Poles more to its liking as a quasi-governmental committee in Lublin. Shortly before Yalta, the Soviet Union recognized this group as the provisional government of the country. Stalin fended off Roosevelt's rather feeble protest by arguing that since the recognition had been voted upon by the Soviet Union's highest constitutional body, the Supreme Soviet, he was powerless to reverse it!

Roosevelt thought at first he could still change the arrangements for Poland, pleading that "it would make it easier for me at home if the Soviet government could give something to Poland," a rather quaint way of asking the Soviets to take less from Poland. Stalin rose to the occasion: he himself would be in trouble politically if his people thought he did not champion their cause vigorously enough. The final communiqué of the conference allowed the Soviet Union to retain the land it secured by agreement with the Nazis in 1939; Poland's western borders were to be established later, but the presumption was that they would cut deeply into pre-1939 Germany.

And now for the offensive: to make Britain and the United States abandon the London-sponsored Polish government and recognize the Soviet-sponsored one. In storming the Western ramparts, Stalin appealed to his allies' democratic sentiments: after five years of exile, the London group was out of touch with the people; anyway, it was mostly fascist. (In fact it included representatives of all the major parties in interwar Poland, including Socialists, and enjoyed an overwhelming support among the Poles.) Churchill asked: Shouldn't British and American observers be first sent to Poland to report on what is going on? Stalin retorted: the Poles are a proud nation. They would resent foreign interference. Roosevelt would have liked some of the Lublin Poles brought to Yalta for an inspection. Stalin said that, unfortunately, for the moment the Soviet authorities could not locate them. Wearily, the British and Americans conceded the main point. The Lublin group would be the nucleus of the future government to be augmented by a few political leaders from Poland and abroad, their democratic virtue to be certified by a commission chaired by Stalin's foreign minister, Vyacheslav Molotov. A cleaning-up operation still remained, but the battle had been won.

What made this success possible were the Russians' concessions on the issue closest to Roosevelt's heart: the United Nations. The Soviets previously had held firmly to the position that each permanent member of the U.N. Security Council should have the right to veto any of its procedures and decisions. On February 7, Molotov suddenly announced that the Soviet Union agreed that procedural questions in the council should be decided by a majority vote, and that a permanent member would not be able to veto discussions of a dispute to which it was a party. For Roosevelt this was "a step forward which would be welcomed by all peoples of the world."

Until Yalta the Russians had insisted that all the 16 constituent republics of the Soviet Union should be represented in the General Assembly, an arrangement that might have jeopardized the chance of the U.S. Charter passing the Senate, or led to demands that the United States should have 48 seats. Now Stalin also abruptly announced that the Soviet Union would be content with just three seats for the Soviet Union as a whole, the Ukraine, and Byelorussia. The United States, he generously added, could also have three places, if it so desired.

A quick-witted Western delegate might have inquired why 8 million Byelorussians deserved such considerations while 100 million Great Russians did not. But so great was the relief on the American side that no one was inclined to ask embarrassing questions, or to be obdurate about the remaining questions on the table. The dangerous rents in the Grand Alliance had been repaired, the cordial partnership among the Big Three had been reaffirmed. That was the main thing for the U.S. policymakers, and by this time Churchill, having very largely accepted Roosevelt's leadership when it came to dealing with Russia, felt constrained, even if groaning inwardly, to go along with the president.

Today we may feel inclined to laugh or cry at some of the incidental glimpses of American diplomacy at Yalta. The president, so successful in dealing with political bosses at home, tried to mellow Boss Stalin. At one time he avowed to his host the belief that it "was difficult to have any prejudices—social, religious, or otherwise—if you really knew people," to which the dictator, who counted among his victims close relatives and friends, readily assented. Peace, Roosevelt felt, would be made more secure if the Soviet Union and the pope were on speaking terms. Hence the incongruous presence in the American delegation of Ed Flynn, the Democratic boss of the Bronx, who called at the Vatican on his way home.

But was Yalta the place of the Great Betrayal (or Deception)? No. The division of Europe resulted from a whole series of events: Soviet usurpations, Western sins of omission and commission, as well as sheer accidents—all going back to 1943 and continuing through 1947. Yalta was simply one stage. As for China, Yalta mattered far less in Mao's ultimate victory than other factors such as the ineptitude of the Kuomintang.

Were Stalin's games an indication of his low esteem for the democratic statesmen? Not exactly. He genuinely admired Churchill, and his behavior at Yalta testifies to his conviction that Roosevelt, though visibly failing, would be a formidable adversary if aroused. The correspondence between them during the few weeks between the conference and Roosevelt's death suggests strongly that he was beginning to take the true measure of Stalin's designs. Had Roosevelt lived out his fourth term, the course of events might have been different.

But Stalin did perceive that the democracies, unless provoked beyond endurance, had little staying power when it came to bargaining about what should come after the victory. How many people in America would have approved a drawn-out dispute with the Russians for the sake of some Polish politicians with unpronounceable names? How many in 1945 would have had patience with the argument that Tokyo could be made to surrender within a year or so after V-E Day through a blockade and aerial attacks, and that neither an invasion of the Japanese homeland nor a Soviet intervention were needed?

One American action that had the most damaging consequences was Roosevelt's statement that U.S. troops could not be expected to remain in Europe for more than two years after Germany's capitulation. This was a signal that the Russians needn't take seriously the Western powers' solemn pledge that the nations liberated from the Nazi yoke must be allowed to determine their own fate through free elections. Impatience, whether to bring the boys home or to settle the issues in dispute in a hurry, was a dangerous tendency when it came to negotiating with the likes of Stalin. But both Roosevelt and Churchill realized that once the guns were silenced, they would cease being war leaders enjoying unquestioning support of their peoples and become once more politicians, subject to pressures and whims of public opinion.

It is almost superfluous to add that the American officials were very badly informed about the political system headed by their intimidating host. People in the State Department such as George Kennan and Charles Bohlen (who was present at Yalta) had considerable knowledge of the Soviet Union, but they were still in junior positions. When the Soviets' policies in East Europe became more arbitrary following the conference, Secretary of State Edward Stettinius wondered whether this could be because "Marshal Stalin had difficulties with the Politburo when he returned to Moscow, for having been too friendly and for having made too many concessions to the two capitalist nations."

And so, without exaggerating the importance of what happened at Yalta, we still ought to ponder its lessons, for some of them are relevant today when the United States is about to embark on yet another predictably complex series of negotiations with the Soviet Union.

THE FUTURE OF YALTA

(By Zbigniew Brzezinski)*

Yalta is unfinished business. It has a longer past and it may have a more ominous future than is generally recognized. Forty years after the fateful Crimean meeting of February 4-11, 1945, between the Allied Big Three of World War II, much of our current preoccupation with Yalta focuses on its myth rather than on its continuing historical significance.

The myth is that at Yalta the West accepted the division of Europe. The fact is that Eastern Europe had been conceded de facto to Josef Stalin by Franklin D. Roosevelt and Winston Churchill as early as the Teheran Conference (in November-December 1943), and at Yalta the British and American leaders had some halfhearted second thoughts about that concession. They then made a last-ditch but ineffective effort to fashion some arrangements to assure at least a modicum of freedom for Eastern Europe, in keeping with Anglo-American hopes for democracy on the European continent as a whole. The Western statesmen failed, however, to face up to the ruthlessness of the emerging postwar Soviet might, and in the ensuing clash between Stalinist power and Western naivete, power prevailed.

Yalta's continuing significance lies in what it reveals about Russia's enduring ambitions toward Europe as a whole. Yalta was the last gasp of carefully calibrated Soviet diplomacy designed to obtain Anglo-American acquiescence to a preponderant Soviet role in all of Europe. At Yalta, in addition to timidly reopening the issue of Eastern Europe, the West also deflected, but again in a vague and timorous fashion, Soviet aspriations for a dominant position in the western extremity of the Eurasian land mass.

Yalta thus remains of great geopolitical significance because it symbolizes the unfinished struggle for the future of Europe. Forty years after Yalta that struggle still involves America and Russia, but by now it should be clear that the issue is unlikely to be resolved in a historically constructive manner until a more active role is assumed by the very object of the contest, Europe itself.

II

The setting for Yalta was prostrated Europe. That once globally dominant civilization had committed historical suicide in the course of two devastating wars fought within the span of a mere quarter-century. When the two leaders of the British and American democracies met with the Georgian tyrant of the Great Russian Empire to resolve the future of Europe, continental Europe was absent from the deliberations. In the meantime, much of Europe's future was being decided on the ground, by the great extra-European armies pushing from the east and the west into Germany, the heart of Europe.

Until Yalta, the key issue perplexing the wartime alliance was Poland, the key to control of Eastern Europe. Thereafter, the issue has increasingly been Germany, the key to control over Western Europe. Poland represented to Moscow the gate to the West, and thus the Kremlin in its wartime diplomacy adopted an attitude of utter intransigence on the question of Poland's future. Though in his memoirs Churchill later described the Polish issue as "the first of the great causes which led to the breakdown of the Grand Alliance," neither he nor his Atlantic partner, President Roosevelt, seemed tp grasp the central strategic importance of the Polish issue; nor was either of them inclined to exploit Russia's initial weakness to obtain a satisfactory resolution of the Polish-Soviet dispute, initiated by the Soviet seizure of almost half of Poland in 1939 as a result of the Stalin-Ribbentrop agreement.

Stalin correctly saw in the territorial dispute the opportunity to transform Polish independence into dependence on Moscow. So did the Poles. Prior to the Teheran meeting, the Polish prime minister desperately warned Churchill (as recorded by Sir William Strang on September 9, 1943) that "what was at stake between Poland and Russia was not merely a question of frontiers but a question of general relations and indeed the question of the survival of Poland as an independent state. . . ."[1] A month later, Foreign Minister Anthony Eden reported to the British War Cabinet that the Polish prime minister had told him on October 6, "The general attitude of Stalin towards Poland, towards Germany and the Free German movement and towards questions touching other occupied countries, as well as his record and his whole mentality, implied more extensive ambitions than ambitions only in the eastern provinces of Poland which were strategically important to Poland but in no sense vital to Russia." Finally, on the eve of the Teheran meeting, Eden briefed the War Cabinet on November 22 that the Poles feared "that Russia's long-term aim is to set up a puppet government in Warsaw and turn Poland into a Soviet republic. . . ."

The British took a more benign view of Stalin's goals. Eden assured the Poles "that British experience suggested that Stalin was much less intransigent . . .," and his internal memorandum on preparations for the forthcoming Teheran Conference makes it clear that the United Kingdom was prepared to satisfy Stalin's territorial goals in the hope that this would produce acceptable political arrangements. If anything, the Americans were even more inclined to gratify Stalin. In keeping with the foregoing, at Teheran in late November and early December 1943, both Churchill and Roosevelt to changes in the Polish frontiers, without any further consultation with the Poles, and more generally conceded to Moscow a preponderant role in the Balkans.

To make matters worse, while pressing the Poles to make territorial concessions to Moscow in the hope of assuaging Russian desires, the British and Americans were unwilling to offer the Poles any assurances regarding compensation in the West. Adopting the position that changes in Germany's frontiers must await the end of the war, London and Washington made the Polish plight more desperate. As a result, most Poles simply refused any compromise on the grounds that a truncated Poland could not survive as an independent entity, while others, shocked and embittered, increasingly saw in Moscow the only sponsor of major Polish territorial acquisition of German territory as a compensation for what was to be absorbed by Russia. The price, however, was the inevitable emergence of Polish dependence on Russia, and through it Soviet domination over Eastern Europe.

By the time of Yalta, not only was Poland occupied by the Red Army, but a new government, sponsored by Stalin, had been installed in Warsaw. At Yalta, the West exacted Soviet promises that the Soviet-installed government would be enlarged and would hold free elections, following which the West would recognize it, but Western leaders agreed not to have any binding obligations regarding the elections inserted into the joint communiqué issued at the conclusion of the Yalta Conference. As a result, how free elections were to be organized remained an exclusive Soviet prerogative, with the outcome thereby predetermined. (Indeed, the Western powers recognized the Warsaw government in mid-1945, even though—contrary to the Yalta agreement—no elections had been held.)

III

By finally foreclosing the issue of Poland in Russia's favor, Yalta opened the battle for the future of Germany. Eastern Poland had been incorporated into the Soviet Union, but the West continued to oppose major Polish expansion at Germany's expense. The Russians at first hesitated in deciding how extensively they ought to support Polish claims. But at the Potsdam Conference in July 1945, following Germany's final collapse, Stalin apparently concluded that with his armies firmly implanted in the middle of Germany he could afford to satisfy Polish needs (thereby permanently cementing Polish dependence on Russia), while continuing to wage his struggle for a preeminent Soviet role in Western Europe.

For Stalin, that struggle was the vital substance of his wartime alliance with the West. Later in 1943, on the eve of the Teheran Conference, Stalin, whose armies were then still fighting on Soviet soil, had succeeded in obtaining Western accord for a major Soviet role in both postwar Germany and Italy, and Western acquiescence to the scuttling of the Polish-Czechoslovak plans for a Central European confederation which might have represented an obstacle to Soviet domination over the region.

The Teheran Conference further nurtured Stalins' grandiose hopes that the British would be unable and the Americans unwilling to oppose his larger designs, which he revealed cautiously, while continuously probing the intentions and the will of his British and American interlocutors. Throughout, Stalin and his associates skillfully played on the anti-imperialist sentiments of the Americans to weaken the British role in any postwar arrangements and on the British rivalry with France to make certain that no center of effective power would emerge in postwar Western Europe. In the Soviet interpretation, Roosevelt's penchant for speaking of the world's "four policemen" could have had only one geopolitical meaning: America's central concern would be the Western Hemisphere, a weak China would be preoccupied with its own problems, and a bankrupt Britain would be enmeshed in its imperial dilemmas, leaving most of Eurasia to the care of the fourth policeman.

In testing Western reactions to his design, Stalin used as bait two somewhat varying schemes for Europe. Though one will never know to what extent these plans were alternative scenarios or competing concepts, both plans provided for a major Soviet role in all of Europe. The two options were succinctly summed up in a conversation on August 31, 1943, between British Foreign Minister Eden and the Soviet ambassador to London, Ivan Maisky, as reported by Eden:

". . . Maisky continued that there were two possible ways of trying to organize Europe after the war. Either we could agree each to have a sphere of interest, the Russians in the East and ourselves and the Americans in the West. He did not himself think this was a good plan, but if it were adopted we should be at liberty to exclude the Russians from French Affairs, the Mediterranean and so forth, and the Russians would claim similar freedom in the East. If, on the other hand, we would both, and the United States also, agree that all Europe was one, as his Government would greatly prefer, then we must each admit the right of the other to an interest in all parts of Europe. If we were concerned with Czechoslovakia and Poland, and the United States with the Baltic States, then we must understand Russian concern in respect of France and the Mediterranean. . . ."[2]

The latter variant was apparently advocated at least until Yalta by Maxim Litvinov, the former Soviet Commissar for Foreign Affairs and former ambassador to Washington. Postulated on the unstated assumption that America would disengage militarily from Europe but that at least a semblance of congeniality between the Soviet Union and its principal wartime allies would continue even after the war, and bound to appeal to the idealistic American dislike of spheres of influence, the plan envisaged not only a Soviet role in all of occupied Germany but in effect a thinly camouflaged arrangement for a Europe dominated indirectly by the Soviet Union, the only effective power in the region. British influence was to be confined to several narrow maritime enclaves, France was to play a negligible role, while continued Soviet-American accommodation would be tacitly premised on American noninvolvement in European affairs. There can be little doubt that the Soviets took seriously Roosevelt's repeated hints both at Teheran and even later at Yalta that the United States would not maintain a postwar military presence in Europe. Given their ideological cast, they must also have been reassured by Roosevelt's tendency to speak privately to Stalin in most negative terms both of the British and of the French, seeing in that confirmation of their theory of "inherent capitalistic contradictions."

The alternative to this strategy of domination through Western acquiescence was associated with Litvinov's principal rival and successor at the helm for foreign affairs, Vyacheslav Molotov. It took more for granted that an American-Soviet collision would eventually occur, presumably after the expected U.S. disengagement from Europe and probably in the context of sharpened intercapitalist conflicts. Molotov's alternative strategy of exclusive control by fait accompli put more emphasis, therefore, on directly subordinating eastern Europe and as much of central Europe as possible, while vigorously asserting Soviet claims to a major role in the West and to a coequal veto-wielding status in relations with the United States. In more specific discussions regarding postwar arrangements for Germany, Stalin was careful to keep his options open. At times he seemed to be favoring a central German government, at other times he would opt for the fragmentation of Germany into several constituent states. In either case, he was always insistent that the Soviet Union have a major say in all of Germany, while making certain that no major West European power was reconstituted.

As the Soviet armies marched westward, Stalin's claims became more explicit both territorially and politically. In addition to retaining everything seized during the collaboration with Hitler, by late 1944 and early 1945 the Soviet Union made territorial demands on Norway (Bear Island and the Spitzbergen) and regarding the Far East (southern Sakhalin, and Kurile Islands, and a preponderant role in Manchuria and Outer Mongolia). Stalin also sought a share in controlling Tangier and a slice of the Italian colonies on the Mediterranean, in addition to proposals for joint action against Franco's Spain and increased political pressure on neutral Switzerland and Sweden. This was followed later by demands for territorial concessions by Turkey. Moreover, the Soviets consistently spoke of France as totally demoralized and worthless, underlining the proposition that Europe was a political vacuum.

Anglo-American surprise and protracted failure to come to grips with the scope of these Soviet ambitions is all the more remarkable when one considers the extent to which Stalin's aspirations mirrored traditional Russian goals. Indeed, they so closely replicated Tsarist objectives in World War I that one may suspect that old Russian planning papers were disinterred for Stalin's and Molotov's use. Some 30 years earlier, in late 1914, the Russian Council of Ministers had also considered the related problems of Poland and of Russian postwar objectives. The majority report focused on the restoration of a Polish kingdom, but under Imperial Russian sway, as Russia's major postwar objective. However, the minority report prepared by the more reactionary members went beyond that priority and defined Russian war objectives much more ambitiously.

Russia's general aims were stated as involving the "strengthening of Russia herself, in an ethnic, economic and strategic way"; in addition to "the possible weakening of Germanism as the chief enemy of Slavdom and Russia at the present time"; and to "the possible liberation of other Slavic peoples from the authority of Germany and Austria-Hungary (insofar as such liberation does not conflict with the direct interests of Russia)." To accomplish the above, Russia was to attain the following specific goals in order of importance:

(1) Completion of the historic task of uniting all sections of the Russian people by reuniting eastern Galicia, northern Bukovina and Carpathian Rus' with Russia.

(2) Realization of the historic tasks of Russia in the Black Sea by the annexation of Tsar'grad (Constantinople) and the Turkish Straits.

(3) Rectification of the borders of the Russian state at the expense of East Prussia and also in Asiatic Turkey.

(4) The weakening of Germany internally in every possible way by means of her complete territorial reconstruction on a new basis, with a possible decrease in Prussian territory to the advantage of France, Belgium, Luxemburg, Denmark and the smaller German states as well, and, perhaps, the restoration of the Kingdom of Hanover, Hesse-Nassau, etc.

(5) Unification and liberation of Poland within the widest possible boundaries, but, in any case, within limits which are ethnographic rather than historic (which would be contrary to the basic interest and entire history of Russia).

(6) Liberation of the remaining Austria Slavs.[3]

What is striking about these war aims, drafted by the more nationalistic and reactionary members of the Council, is their identity with Soviet post-World War II objectives defined by Stalin and Molotov. Everyone of the objectives became Stalin's: the incorporation of parts of Polish Galicia were previously held by Russia and of Czechoslovak Subcarpathia were identical with the first 1914 goal; the second objective was denied to the Soviets, but they did press for it in their conversations with the Western allies (presumably recalling that in the spring of 1915 France and Britain had conceded as much to Tsarist Russia); the third objective was obtained in East Prussia (again a surprise to Westerners), and the Soviets in 1945 pressed for territorial concessions from Turkey but without success; the fourth was achieved in a different form in Germany; the fifth pushed Poland further west than was thought possible in 1914 but with functionally the same result—the creation of a Poland highly dependent on Russia for its territorial integrity.

One can thus classify Soviet wartime objectives as falling into three categories: first, recovery of the territorial status quo ante as of June 1941; second, securing politically acquiescent regimes in east-central Europe; third, gaining a preponderant voice regarding the political organization of the rest of Europe. The Soviets were totally unyielding and quite open about the first objective; they were prepared, however, to camouflage the second objective if it served to promote the attainment of the third goal. It is easy to forget how uncertain at the time was America's postwar role in Europe, while American unwillingness during wartime to focus concretely on postwar issues fortified the expectation that it would again turn inward. As Soviet forces moved westward, their pursuit of the second objective became more brazen, and it assumed brutal manifestations when it dawned upon the Soviets that there might not be an American acquiescence to the attainment of the third objective. That realization dawned on Stalin and his colleagues with increasing intensity after Yalta.

IV

Yalta can therefore be said to have initiated the postwar struggle for Europe. Yet it was hailed in the West as an unmitigated diplomatic trumph, foreshadowing a period of prolonged East-West accommodation. Forty years later this very same Yalta continues to evoke equally simplistic—though opposite—emotions. It is now the synonym for betrayal. At the time its decisions were said (according to a New York Times editorial of February 13, 1945) to "justify and surpass most of the hopes placed on this fateful meeting . . . they show the way to an early victory in Europe, to a secure peace and to a brighter world."

Sumner Wells might be accused of some partiality when he announced (in The Washington Post on February 28, 1945) that ". . . the Declaration of Yalta, whatever the future may bring forth, will always stand out as a gigantic step forward toward the ultimate establishment of a peaceful and orderly world." But even such an experienced observer as Walter Lippmann was not to be outdone. Writing in The New York Herald Tribune on February 15, 1945, Lippmann informed his readers that Churchill, Stalin and Roosevelt "have checked and reversed the normal tendency of a victorious coalition to dissolve as the war, which called it into being, approaches its end. . . . The military alliance is proving itself to be no transitory thing, good only in the presence of a common enemy, but in truth the nucleus and core of a new international order."

Skeptical voices were few and far between. The Wall Street Journal warned on February 16, 1945, that the Yalta deal on central Europe "can only lead to increasingly unsatisfactory relations between the United States and Russia"; while a perceptive Frenchman, Andre Visson, (writing in The Washington Post on February 18, 1945, in an article entitled "Big Powers and Small Nations") noted that the United States was finally becoming committed to the future of Europe and was showing signs of a willingness even to contest the Soviet domination over Eastern Europe—unlike at Teheran, where it seemed uninterested in postwar arrangements and willing to settle for "the division of Europe into two zones of influence."

In fact, Yalta was the last effort by the wartime partners to construct the postwar world jointly. Unlike Teheran, where Churchill was still clearly Roosevelt's equal, at Yalta the lead was taken by the Americans, foreshadowing the bipolar world that was in fact emerging. The real collision at Yalta was between Roosevelt's well-meaning vagueness about arrangements for Europe's postwar future and Stalin's studied vagueness about the extent of Russia's desire to dominate that future. The former desperately wanted to believe in postwar cooperation while the latter deliberately exploited that faith to create facts on the ground while pressing for Western acceptance of Soviet claims in both the west and the far east of the Eurasian continent.

As a result, the Yalta declarations were manifestly escapist in character. The provisions regarding free elections in Poland were at best a transparent fig leaf for outright Soviet domination, while the rhetoric concerning future peace simply obscured the emerging and very basic differences between the major powers. However, that rhetoric did serve to further delude Western public opinion regarding Russia's true intentions, thereby making it more difficult for the Western democracies to cope effectively with the emerging East-West confrontation.

By failing to construct an agreed-upon world, while in effect sanctioning the concessions made earlier at Teheran, Yalta became subsequently the symbol of Europe's partition. The follow-on meeting at Potsdam was merely a contentious session to carve the spoils. It was at Yalta that the Westerners belatedly had their first inklings that the concession of Eastern Europe to Soviet domination might be the beginning of the contest for central and Western Europe, while to Stalin Western reticence regarding satisfaction of the wider Soviet goals foreshadowed a more difficult political struggle than apparently anticipated earlier. Henceforth, the increasingly overt preoccupation of Soviet policy became one of driving the United States out of Eurasia.

That preoccupation has endured for the 40 subsequent years—and today it is still the central motif of Soviet foreign policy. Its concomitant is the determination to prevent the emergence of a genuine Europe motivated by shared political will. The last four decades, however, also reveal an important strategic lesson: what has come to be seen as the legacy of Yalta—namely the partitioned Europe—can only be undone either in Soviet favor through Litvinov's more subtle design of domination through acquiescence, or to Europe's historical advantage by the emergence of a truly European Europe capable both of attracting Eastern Europe and of diluting Soviet control over the region. America does not have the power or the will to change basically the situation in Eastern Europe, while crude and heavy-handed Soviet efforts to intimidate West Europe merely consolidate the Atlantic connection.

Of the two principal sides, it has been the Soviet that has sought much more persistently than the American to achieve a geopolitical breakthrough, settling the fate of Eurasia. Yalta had stimulated Soviet anxieties that America might not in fact disengage totally from Europe; Potsdam reinforced them, while the subsequent announcement of the Marshall Plan confirmed Moscow's worst fears: America, contrary to Stalin's hopes and expectations, was becoming implanted on the continent, de facto checking the expansion of Soviet power.

Subsequent history has been punctuated by more overt and direct Soviet efforts to challenge that reality head-on—above and beyond the relentless attempts to undermine it. The political campaign against the Marshall Plan, and Stalin's open decision to keep both Czechoslovakia and Poland out of it, were undertaken in the context of the strategic conclusion that not only would America remain engaged in European affairs but that a protracted political conflict was now inevitable. The subsequent Berlin crisis was thus an important test of will, designed to challenge America's suddenly improvised determination to play a major role in the truncated Germany.

It is important to be clear about it: neither Stalin's blockade of Berlin, nor Khrushchev's Berlin crisis of a decade later, was about Berlin itself. In both cases, the stake was the American security connection with Western Europe. This is why both Stalin and Khrushchev were willing to risk even a period of very high tension—dangerously high tension—with America, something which Berlin itself did not merit. Had the Soviets prevailed, Germany would have been panicked, and the vaunted American commitment to the defense of Europe would have been rendered impotent. The geopolitical effect of a Soviet success in Berlin would have been to establish Soviet paramountcy over Western Europe.

Though the two Berlin crises were the most overt indicators of enduring Soviet determination to sever the Atlantic security connection, Soviet diplomacy throughout the postwar era has pursued also the cardinal objective of ensuring that a geopolitically vital Europe does not surface as a competitor or even as a neighbor. Soviet foreign policy—using all its diplomatic leverage as well as such overt and hidden tools as the West European Communist parties and the myriad of fellow travelers—has been active in opposing such schemes as the European Defense Community, and it has above all persistently tried to place obstacles in the way of the Common Market's evolution toward a political personality. Even if Western Europe cannot be severed from America, it must at least be kept divided and weak.

The commitment to the goal of expelling America from Europe is not just lingering in the Kremlin. It animates the current Soviet leadership, a leadership more Stalinist in substance than any since 1953. Attempting to exploit the West European "peace movements" and unease regarding the anti-Soviet rhetoric of the Reagan Administration, the current Soviet leadership decided to evaluate the INF (intermediate-range nuclear forces) issue into a new test of will, again making the Atlantic security connection the ultimate stake. The Soviet decision to refuse to negotiate with the United States on arms control issues unless the United States dismantles and removes its Pershing IIs and ground-launched cruise missiles is tantamount to an attempt to impose on America a public humiliation with wide-ranging strategic consequences. It is the functional equivalent to the earlier Berlin crises.

But the Soviet leadership has again overreached itself. Its heavy-handed tactics contributed to the defeat of the neutralist Social Democratic Party in Germany, to the discrediting of the unilateral disarmers in the Labour Party in Britain, and to the strong show of solidarity with America displayed by Europe on this issue. (Parenthetically, one may add that almost simultaneously the present Soviet leadership has stimulated in Japan the highest degree of anti-Sovietism since World War II.) It did so because it overestimated the depth of the neutralist sentiments and the extent of the West European, even the German, stake in the East-West détente. It may also have overestimated the impact on West European public opinion of the greatly increased Soviet strategic power, especially in comparison to the Berlin crises of the late 1940s and the late 1950s. The Soviet leaders may have calculated that the combination of a specifically West European interest in détente with the growing fear of Soviet military power (especially with the massive deployment of the SS-20s targeted on Western Europe) might stampede the West Europeans—even if not the Americans—into a unilateral accommodation. They thus relied too much on simple political intimidation.

Nonetheless, in addition to noting Soviet persistence in seeking to achieve the subordination of Western Europe, it is important not to be overly reassured by the Soviet failure. For that failure is due more to the crudeness of the Soviet tactics than to the resilience of Western Europe. The fact is that Western Europe as such has not emerged politically. In that respect the Soviet Union can be said to have achieved at least a part of what it has been seeking since Yalta. In the meantime, the continued division of Europe breeds growing resentment not only of the direct Soviet domination over Eastern Europe but also of the American role in Europe, a situation which more skillfull Soviet diplomacy could at some point more intelligently exploit.

The political reality is that America cannot undo Europe's partition, but the existence of that partition intensifies the American-Soviet rivalry which in turn perpetuates the partition. Though America has at times sought to loosen the bonds that both tie and subordinate Eastern Europe to Moscow, at the truly critical junctures America has chosen not to contest Soviet domination directly. American policy has aimed at carefully encouraging the peaceful evolution of a somewhat more pluralistic Eastern Europe, a process that is bound to take time and which can periodically be reversed by force, as through martial law in Poland in 1981. However, when the East German regime collapsed in 1953, when Hungary arose in 1956, when Czechoslovakia peacefully emancipated itself in 1968 only to be invaded by Soviet armed forces, the United States adopted a passive posture masked by anti-Soviet rhetoric. Whether more could have been done is debatable, but that not much was done is undeniable.

VI

American prudence is one reason why the Europeans sense that America cannot undo the division of Europe. The other reason is even more basic. America cannot undo the partition of Europe without in effect defeating Russia. And that the Russians must and will resist firmly—just as the direct expulsion of America from Western Europe would be resisted by America as an intolerable defeat. At the same time, the partition of Germany in the context of the partition of Europe makes both partitions a live issue. It ensures a continuing political struggle for the future of Germany and thus for the future of Europe. It locks America and Russia into a strategically central conflict, but with the stakes so high that neither can countenance a direct defeat. With divided Germany thus serving as the permanent catalyst for change, the issue of the future of Europe remains a live issue, despite the stalemate of the last 40 years.

The situation might have been altogether different if the division of Europe had not entailed simultaneously the division of Germany. If instead of the Elbe the geopolitical American-Soviet frontier had been fixed on the Rhine or on the Oder-Neisse line, the division of Europe into two spheres of influence would have been neater and politically easier to maintain. With the Rhine as the dividing line, the West European rump would have felt so threatened by the Soviet presence, backed by a Sovietized Germany, that henceforth its enduring preoccupation would have been to insure the closest possible ties with America, forgetting altogether about the fate of the Soviet-dominated central and eastern Europe. If, on the other hand, Soviet sway had been extended only to the Oder-Neisse line, the Poles and the Czechs would have been so fearful that an American-backed Germany might resume its traditional Drang nach Osten that the partition of Europe would have been of very secondary concern.

As it happens, the existing stalemate is increasingly resented by all Europeans. The Germans—no longer dominated by feelings of war guilt, less mesmerized by the American ideal, distressed by the failure of Europe to become an alternative to divisive nationalisms—are naturally drawn to a growing preoccupation with the fate of their brethren living under an alien system. The notion that the destiny of a united Germany depends on a close relationship with Russia is not a new one in German political tradition. Frustration with the nation's division is giving it a new lease on life.

Moreover, for Germany especially but also for Western Europe as a whole, the East holds a special economic attraction. It has been the traditional market for West European industrial goods, As Western Europe discovers that in its fragmented condition it is becoming less competitive with the high-tech economies of America and Japan, the notion of a special economic relationship with the East becomes particularly appealing. The fear that America may be turning from the Atlantic to the Pacific has in this connection a self-fulfilling and a self-validating function: it justifies a wider economic, and potentially even a political, accommodation between an industrially obsolescent Western Europe and the even more backward Soviet bloc, a logical consumer for what Western Europe can produce.

More than most Europeans, the East Europeans, no longer expecting American liberation, long for a genuine Europe which would free them from the Soviet yoke. That longing explains the extraordinary standing to this day in Eastern Europe of de Gaulle—simply because he raised the standard of "Europe to the Ural." It explains also the special appeal of the Pope, whose vision of Europe's spiritual unity has obvious political implications. But the East Europeans will settle for half a loaf if they cannot have the whole. Faced with the choice of exclusive Soviet domination, only occasionally contested by American policy, or of at least growing ties with even a politically weak Western Europe, the East Europeans clearly prefer the latter.

To register all of this is not to say that Europe will simply drift into a separate accommodation with the Soviet Union, fulfilling long-standing Soviet ambitions. It is to note, however, the potential and growing West European susceptibility to a Soviet policy based more on Litvinov's prescriptions than on Stalinist practices. A Soviet policy designed to exploit more subtly the continued absence of a united Europe, the mounting American frustration with the low level of the European defense effort, and the inevitable appeal of escapist notions regarding disarmament, nuclear freezes, and the like could have a significant impact on both American and European public opinion. Indeed, under certain circumstances, one can even envisage a spontaneous American inclination to disengage from Europe, with conservatives advocating it out of irritation with European unwillingness to do more for common defense, and with liberals propounding it because of their current tendency to deal with difficult security matters by evasion. The U.S. deficit will, in any case, drive Congress toward a more critical look at the cost of the U.S. NATO commitment.

In Europe itself, such a more subtle Litvinov-type Soviet policy would aim not at the dismantling of NATO as such but at depriving it of any political or military substance. Exploiting the duality of German feelings and the growing ties between Bonn and East Berlin, it would seek to transform Germany into a quasi-neutral member of NATO, thereby alarming and further fragmenting Western Europe. Instead of concentrating on trying to inflict on America a visible and direct political defeat in Europe, it would play on European unwillingness to associate itself with America in wider global and ideological rivalry with Russia, in order to achieve European acquiescence to a subordinate relationship with Moscow.

It is not self-fulfilling pessimism to note that a Europe dependent military, fragmented politically, and anachronistic economically remains a Europe more vulnerable to such blandishments. In brief, a sustained Soviet peace offensive poses the greater danger that Moscow finally might succeed in splitting Europe from America and thus, taking advantage of Europe's continued historical fatigue, attain finally a Yaltanized Europe.

VII

As President Mitterrand put it some two years ago, "Tout ce qui permettera de sortir de Yalta sera bon. . . ." But how to escape from Yalta? Forty years later, there must be a better option for both Europe and America than either a partitioned and prostrated Europe that perpetuates the American-Soviet collision, or a disunited Europe divorced from America acquiescing piecemeal to Soviet domination over Eurasia. And there is such a third option: the emergence of a politically more vital Europe less dependent militarily on the United States, encouraged in that direction by an American guided by a timely historic vision, and leading eventually to a fundamentally altered relationship with Eastern Europe and with Russia.

This third option requires a long-term strategy of the kind that the West simply has not devised in dealing with the enduring post-Yalta European dilemma. The point of departure for such a long-term strategy has to be joint recognition of the important conclusion which the experience of the last several decades teaches: the historic balance in Europe will be changed gradually in the West's favor only if Russia comes to be faced west of the Elbe rather less by America and rather more by Europe.

Thoughtful Europeans realize, moreover, that the future of Europe is intertwined with the future of Germany and of Poland. Without spanning, in some non-threatening fashion, the division of Germany, there will not be a genuine Europe; but continuing Russian domination of Poland makes Russian control over East Germany geopolitically possible. Thus the relationship between Russia on the one hand and Germany and Poland on the other must be peacefully transformed if a larger Europe is ever to emerge.

Both Americans and Europeans must also face up to the implications of the fact that the division of Europe is not only the unnatural consequence of the destruction of Europe in the course of two world wars; in the long run it is also an inherenty unstable and potentially dangerous situation. It is likely to produce new explosions in Eastern Europe and it could also generate a basic and destabilizing reorientation in Western Europe, especially since for many Europeans the existence of the two alliances across the dividing line in the middle of Europe is seen as an extension of superpower efforts to perpetuate the status quo.

Accordingly, concentration on the purely military dimension of the East-West problem, or trying to get the West Europeans to hew to the U.S. line in the Middle East or in Central America, is not going to preserve Western unity. America has to identify itself with a cause which has deeply felt emotional significance to most Europeans. Undoing the division of Europe, which is so essential to its spiritual and moral recovery, is a goal worthy of the Western democracies and one capable of galvanizing a shared sense of historic purpose.

But that objective, so essential to Europe's restoration, cannot be accomplished as an American victory over Russia. Nor will it be achieved by an explicit Russian acceptance, through a negotiated agreement, of Eastern Europe's emancipation from Russian vassalage. Moscow will not yield voluntarily. A wider Europe can ony emerge as a consequence of a deliberately but subtly induced process of change, by historical stealth so to speak, which can neither be quickly detected nor easily resisted.

The West must shape that process and give it historical direction. As the point of departure for seeking the common goal, one can envisage a strategy combining five broad political, economic and military dimensions. Some involve relatively simple acts and can be summarized succinctly; some require more complicated processes of change, are bound to be more controversial, and thus require a fuller justification.

First, on the symbolic plane, it would be appropriate for the heads of the democratic West as a whole, perhaps on February 4, 1985, to clarify jointly, through a solemn declaration, the West's attitude toward the historic legacy of Yalta. In publicly repudiating that bequest—the partition of Europe—the West should underline its commitment to a restored Europe, free of extra-European control. It should stress its belief that there now exists a genuine European political identity, the heir to Europe's civilization, which is entitled to unfettered expression. It should affirm the right of every European nation to choose its sociopolitical system in keeping with its history and tradition. It should explicitly reject and condemn Moscow's imposition on so many Europeans of a system that is culturally and politcally so alien to them. Finally, by drawing attention to the positive experience of neutral Austria and Finland, it should pledge that a more authentic Europe would not entail the extension of the American sphere of influence to the European state frontiers of the Soviet Union.

Second, and in direct connection with the renunciation of Yalta's burden, the West should simultaneously reconfirm its commitment to the Helsinki Final Act. This is absolutely essential, for otherwise the repudiation of Yalta could give the Soviets the convenient argument that the territorial integrity of Poland and of Czechoslovakia is thereby again endangered. The Helsinki agreements confirmed the durability of the existing frontiers in central and eastern Europe, and the eastern nations must be reassured on this score. At the same time, the Helsinki agreements legalized and institutionalized the notion that the West has a right to comment on the internal practices of East European governments and that respect of human rights is a general international obligation. Accordingly, the repudiation of Yalta's historic legacy should be accompanied by the reaffirmation of the West's commitment to peaceful East-West relations, to the maintenance of the existing territorial status quo, and to the indivisibility of the concepts of freedom and human rights.

Moreover, reaffirmation of the continued Western commitment to the Helsinki Final Act could help to resolve the potentially fatal European ambivalence regarding Germany. The fact is that, while the Europeans resent their historic partition, they fear almost as much a reunited Germany. Therefore, the renunciation of Yalta's legacy—the division of Europe—should be accompanied by an explicit pledge, through the reaffirmation of Helsinki's continued relevance, that the purpose of healing the East-West rift in Europe is not to dismantle any existing state but to give every European people the opportunity to participate fully in wider all-European cooperation. In that context, the division of Germany need not be undone through formal reunification but by the gradual emergence of a much less threatening loose confederation of the existing two states.

Third, much in keeping with the spirit of these symbolic acts, Western Europe should strive to create the maximum number of opportunities for East European participation in various all-European bodies. There is today a proliferation of such institutions, both private and public. East Europeans should be encouraged quietly but systematically to increase their participation—even if initially only as observers—in such bodies as the European Parliament, as well as the myriad of more specialized technical agencies. The fostering in Eastern Europe of the European spirit, and of greater East European recognition that there is more to Europe today than meets the eye, is clearly in the interest of all Europe. But a new burst of energy in this regard is much needed.

It would also be appropriate for the major West European nations, as well as for America, to sponsor during the Yalta year of 1985—on either a private or public basis—a series of seminars and conferences on the future of post-Yalta Europe. A special effort should be made to invite East Europeans to participate, on whatever basis is possible, in deliberations designed to forge during that year a wider consensus on how best to undo peacefully Yalta's legacy.

In addition, Western Europe should reactivate efforts previously initiated but lately dormant designed to encourage closer contacts and eventually even some form of collaboration between the Common Market and Eastern Europe. In different ways, both East Germany and Yugoslavia today have practical relationships with that important West European entity. Precisely because the present Soviet leadership has stepped up its efforts to integrate Eastern Europe into COMECON and thus to bind it to the Soviet economy, additional initiative on the part of the Common Market is now badly needed. Even if the East Europeans, under Soviet pressure, were to refuff such Western efforts at closer contacts, exchange of information and some cooperative projects, the Western initiative would still have a positive effect. The recent East German willingness to risk Soviet displeasure at growing inter-German ties reflects the widespread desire as well as economic need of Eastern Europe for closer links with the rest of Europe. The continued economic stagnation of the Soviet-type economies makes the timing for greater Western activism in this regard particularly propitious.

Fourth, and in no way in conflict with the preceding, Europe should intensify its aid to those East Europeans who are struggling actively for the political emancipation of Eastern Europe. That struggle is the necessary concomitant and at least partially also the cause of evolutionary change in Eastern Europe. Only too often do West European well-wishers of a more independent Eastern Europe look askance at those in the East who undertake more direct forms of struggle. While cultivation of East European officials enjoys a certain fashionable prestige in Western circles, tangible assistance to those resisting totalitarianism is viewed only too frequently as somehow "in the spirit of the cold war."

Yet a division of labor between America and Europe in which the former is seen as alone in supporting dissident "subversion" while the latter engages exclusively in official courtship would be self-defeating. West Europeans should undertake to provide support for some of the activities that America has quite generously, for Europe's sake as well as for its own, sustained for more than three decades. The French recently have done so for the Polish Solidarity movement, and so have some other Europeans. Radio Paris has been gaining more East European listeners. But much more needs to be done. Germany, for example, after Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in effect endorsed Wojciech Jaruzelski's martial law in Poland, confined itself to truly humanitarian private philanthropy; it has not been as active as it could be in sustaining various forms of East European political activity designed to induce the existing regimes to transform themselves.

In subtle but sustained fashion West Europe could aid the East Europeans in such efforts, because in the age of transistors and mass communications totalitarian control can be pierced, with positive political effect. Western Europe should, after all, be a direct partner in the struggle for Europe's future, and a well-funded Franco-British-German-Italian consortium (a Foundation for a Post-Yalta Europe) to aid East European efforts to emancipate peacefully the eastern portion of Europe would be an appropriate and long overdue contribution.

Fifth, the time has come for a more fundamental rethinking of the relationship between Western security and political change in Europe as a whole. The West can make the needed adjustment, and America—since it plays the central military role—should take the lead to that end. America is needed in Europe to deter Russia not only from military aggression but from political intimidation. That is obvious and it justifies NATO and the American military presence on the continent. But an American military presence that reduces the incentive for the Europeans to unite politically, yet simultaneously increases the incentive for the Soviets to stay put militarily in central and eastern Europe, is a military presence not guided by a subtle political-historical calculus. A more sensitive calibration of the political-military equation is needed in order to safeguard Western Europe while promoting change in the East-West relationship.

If Europe is to emerge politically, it must assume a more direct role in its own defense. A Europe that plays a larger defense role will require a lesser, or at least a redefined, American military presence. A Europe that can defend itself more on its own is a Europe that is also politically more vital, while less challenging to the Soviet Union from a purely military point of view, than a Europe with a large American military presence in its very center. Such a Europe would then be better able to satisfy the East European yearning for closer association without such association being tantamount to an American defeat of Russia.

But Europe must be prodded to move in that direction. Left as it is, Europe's cultural hedonism and political complacence will ensure that not much is done. Even the modest 1978 NATO commitment to a three percent per annum increase in defense expenditures was not honored by most European states. America should, therefore, initiate a longer-term process to alter the nature of its military presence in Europe gradually, while making it clear to the Europeans that the change is not an act of anger or a threat (á la the Mansfield resolution) but rather the product of a deliberate strategy designed to promote Europe's unity and its historic restoration.

Ultimately, the United States in NATO should be responsible primarily for offsetting Soviet strategic power, thus deterring both a Soviet attack or nuclear blackmail. But on the ground, the defense of Europe over the next decade should become an even more predominantly European responsibility. The needed process of replacing gradually but not totally (and certainly not in Berlin) the U.S. ground combat forces could perhaps be accelerated if, through the Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions talks or otherwise, the Soviet Union were willing to reciprocate by comparable withdrawals of its own ground forces. But, in any case, it should be accompanied by appropriate European efforts to assume greater responsibility for the defense of Europe not only on a purely national basis but through enhanced European defense coordination.

The United States should particularly encourage efforts at increased Franco-German military cooperation and eventual integrational. France has a historic awareness of a European identity while Germany chafes under Europe's partition. A Franco-German army would have the manpower, the resources, and the fighting potential to pick up the slack created by a gradual decrease in the American combat presence on the ground. The eventual fusion of these two national forces into a joint combat force would represent a giant step toward a politically more vital Europe, yet a Europe which would be less conflictual with the Soviet Union than a Europe hosting a large U.S. army and less threatening to Eastern Europe than a Europe with a powerful separate German army. A gradually reduced U.S. ground presence would in turn create pressure from even the existing East European regimes for a commensurate Soviet redeployment, thereby gradually creating a more flexible political situation.

To move Europe in this direction, the United States will have to take the first steps, even perhaps unilaterally through a ten-year program of annual cuts in the level of the U.S. ground forces in Europe. But these steps should be taken in the context of an articulated strategy that has a constructive political as well as military rationale. Its political purpose should be openly proclaimed; to create the setting for Europe's restoration and, through it, also for a more stable East-West relationship. It would also have to be made clear that some American combat forces would remain in Europe, as they do in Korea, thereby ensuring immediate American engagement in the event of hostilities. Moreover, continued American strategic protection of Europe should not remain confined only to the possible employment of nuclear weaponry. It should over time, with technological advance, be enhanced to include also some strategic defense. As strategic defense for America becomes more viable, it should be a major American goal to extend some of its protection to Europe as well.

A division of labor in NATO along the foregoing lines would make it much easier to consider by Yalta's fiftieth anniversary also those East-West security and political arrangements which at the moment seem premature, unrealistic, or excessively threatening to America or to Russia. These could include demilitarized or nuclear-free zones or extension of the Austrian-type neutrality to other areas, including later even to a loosely confederated Germany. It would encourage a process of change permitting the latent or frustrated West and East European impulses for the restoration of Europe gradually to surface. Eventually, it would permit Europe to emerge, and to play a major role on the Eurasian continent, along with the Soviet Union, India and China, while helping to ensure through its links with America that no single power dominates that geopolitically vital continent.

VIII

The fiftieth anniversary of Yalta is only ten years away. It should be our shared goal to fashion by then political-military arrangements which, instead of perpetuating the division of Europe—and perhaps even prompting West Europe's political decay, create the preconditions for peacefully undoing Yalta. A Western Europe essentially self-reliant in regional defense, while covered by the U.S. system of nuclear deterrence and also eventually by U.S. strategic defense, would be a Western Europe more capable of pursuing a positive policy toward the East without fear of domination by Moscow. In the final analysis, only Europeans can restore Europe; it cannot be done for them by others.

To be sure, Moscow will resist the aspirations of the Europeans. No empire dissolves itself voluntarily—at least not until it becomes evident that accommodation to gradual dissolution is preferable to the rising costs of preserving the imperial system. So it will be also with the Soviet empire. Moscow will violently protest any Western disavowal of Yalta's legacy and will accuse the West of worsening East-West relations; that is only to be expected. But such public disavowal is the necessary point of departure for more focused efforts by all the Europeans gradually to undo their continent's division. Once that historic commitment has been made, these efforts, as recommended here, need not be either aggressive or initially even very explicit. As time passes, with the organic growth of a larger Europe gathering momentum, it will become more and more difficult for the Kremlin to resist a process that over time may acquire the hallmarks of historical inevitability. At some point, then, even the Soviets may find it useful to codify some new neutrality arrangements in central Europe and to reduce and eventually to remove their occupation forces.

One should not underestimate in this connection Moscow's adaptability. Despite his ruthlessness, even Stalin accommodated himself to the reality of an independent Catholic Church in Poland; Khrushchev to a Polish peasantry free from collectivization and to a separate Romanian foreign policy; Brezhnev to "goulash communism in Hungary and to army rule in Poland. Why then should not the next generation of Soviet leaders be pressed also to come to terms with the fact that even the interests of the Soviet people would be better served by a less frustrated and oppressed east-central Europe, partaking more directly of the benefits of all-European cooperation.

As divided Europe enters the fifth decade after Yalta, it is important to reiterate that undoing Yalta cannot involve a precise blueprint or a single dramatic initiative. The shape of the future cannot be reduced to a neat plan, with specific phases and detailed agreements. Rather, it requires an explicit commitment and a sense of strategic direction for a process of change that is bound to have also its own dynamic. In any case, for America the emergence of a more vital Europe would be a positive outcome, for ultimately a pluralistic world is in America's true interest. Moreover, such a development would avert the major danger that if Yalta's legacy is not deliberately—though peacefully—undone in the East, it will eventually become the reality in the West. In other words, Yalta must be consigned to Europe's past if it is not to become Europe's future.

MEMORANDUM OF THE POLISH GOVERNMENT-IN-EXILE ON THE REPUDIATION OF THE YALTA AGREEMENTS OF FEBRUARY 1945

SUMMARY

1. The Yalta decisions have their origin in the Soviet territorial expansion in the period from 1939 to 1941, made possible by the Soviet-German collaboration following the Ribbentrop-Molotov Pact.

2. The Yalta decisions on Poland constituted an internationally consecrated satellisation of an independent state.

3. The real meaning of the Yalta agreement was that it facilitated further Soviet expansion up to the Elbe by way of both, formal annexations and the creation of a belt of satellite states. It is, however, incorrect to speak of the partition of Europe into two spheres of influence, the situation in Western Europe not being comparable in any way to that prevailing in the East.

4. The legal nature of the Yalta decisions remains obscure; whether or not these constitute an international treaty, there is no legal obstacle to their termination.

5. Such termination cannot by itself change the actual situation in Central and Eastern Europe; it would, however, be of major moral and political significance in the shaping of new policies aiming at such a change.

6. The Polish Government-in-Exile which, in 1945, vigorously protested against the Yalta decisions and refused to recognise their validity, now requests the Governments of the Free World to repudiate the Yalta agreements and to declare them null and void.

INTRODUCTION

The recent events in Poland have broken the silence which has prevailed over the Yalta decisions for 37 years. As the question is now reopened, it seems useful to attempt a reassessment of the Yalta agreement, its origins, meaning and consequences for Europe.

THE ORIGINS

The Yalta meeting between Churchill, Roosevelt and Stalin on 4–11 February 1945 was not an isolated event but a link in the chain of historical events out of which it grew. Soviet-German collaboration for almost two years after the start of the Second World War brought the Soviet Union important territorial acquisitions: from a strip of Finnish territory in the north, through the three Baltic states, Eastern Poland, down to Rumanian Bessarabia and Bukovina, i.e. to the mouth of the Danube in the South. The acquisition of Eastern Poland proved to be of decisive influence for the future.[1]

---

[1] "From the partition of Poland the path leads, even in a roundabout way, to the agreements with

Even prior to the German attack on 22 June 1941, the Soviet Union made it clear that she expected Great Britain to recognise her annexation of the Baltic states before relations between the two countries could improve.[2] Having found herself in the Allied camp as a result of the German attack, the USSR made her position unmistakably clear as early as December 1941: she intended not only to keep all the gains achieved during the period of Soviet-German collaboration but demanded moreover the right to establish bases in Finland and Rumania, while signalling her agreement to possible future British bases in Denmark and Norway.[3] It soon became evident that the intended Soviet expansion would take two forms: straightforward annexations and the creation of a belt of satellite states endowed with "friendly" governments along the Soviet formal frontiers. It is impossible, within the limits of this paper, to trace the long road the Western powers have travelled from an initial categorical rejection of all such demands, through successive partial concessions, to their complete endorsement. The process is now fully documented both in official publications and in memoirs of statesmen.

THE YALTA DECISIONS

In this process the Yalta Conference represents a crucial development. The Conference dealt with a wide range of problems.[4] It was, however, the Polish question which occupied most of its time and which, by common admission, was of particular importance. The decisions on Poland must therefore briefly be recalled.

Poland, the ally on whose behalf Britain and France went into war, was absent from a conference which was to decide her future frontiers and her government. Moreover, Poland was treated as if she existed only in a vacuum, possessing no statehood, no government, no frontiers and not even a population which need be consulted. The vacuum was not filled in complete accordance with the long standing Soviet claims. Poland's eastern frontier was drawn as the Soviet Union demanded, thus, confirming the territorial gains already made under the 1939 Ribbentrop-Molotov agreement. Against this decision, the compensation Poland was to receive in the West was left undetermined both in its geographical extent and in its legal status. This new territorial entity, determined in the loss but undetermined in the gain, was to be endowed with a "friendly" government which, by common consent,[5] was to be a Soviet puppet, intended to act as an instrument of Soviet policy, which Western powers for this very reason had consistently refused to recognise. To make such recognition now palatable, this body had to be slightly refashioned by the inclusion of an insignificant number of outsiders, the refashioning to take place in Moscow, under the auspices of Molotov, the Soviet Foreign Minister, accompanied by the British and American ambassadors accredited to the Soviet Government. This "new" Polish government itself not a party to the decision—was to conduct "free and unfettered" elections at an unspecified date and in the absence of all institutional guarantees.

The Yalta decision on Poland was thus a clear case of an internationally consecrated satellisation of an independent state, to be borne out later by events within Poland and outside.

THE REAL MEANING OF YALTA

The question must now be asked (a) what was the real meaning of Yalta and (b) what it was not.

(a) If the decision on Poland was given pre-eminence in this paper it was because it transcends by far the fate of the Polish nation. Indeed, the abandonment of Poland to the Soviet empire, combined with the already existing Soviet occupation of Baltic states and the impending control of Eastern Germany, was inexorably bound to result in the loss of independence of all countries lying between Germany and Russia and in the establishment of Soviet domination up to the Elbe. It may be a matter of speculation whether a joint military occupation of Germany, on the model of the joint occupation of Berlin and Vienna, would have impeded or at least rendered more difficult such domination.[6] The fact remains that the attribution of individual Allied zones of occupation had already been decided long before the Yalta conference [7] and that this obviously helped to close the Soviet ring around Poland.

The satellisation of Poland, an international act performed at a single stroke, was followed by unilateral and more gradual satellisation of other countries in Central and Eastern Europe. Thus, for instance, the subjudication of Czechoslovakia took place as a result of unilateral Soviet pressure and as late as February 1948.[8]

As a result, this stage of Soviet empire-building was completed around 1953, with formal annexations including strips of Finland, the Baltic states, part of East Prussia with Konigsberg, Eastern Poland, Subcarpathian Ukraine, Bessarabia and Bukovina. The formal Soviet frontiers now surpass anything Czarist Russia ever held in Europe. To the West of these formal frontiers there was erected an advanced glacis of satellite states, including Poland, East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia and Albania, although the last two succeeded later in recovering their independence from the Soviet suzerainty.

This then is the real meaning of Yalta: the extension of the formal Soviet frontiers and the enslavement of half of Europe not by way of a formal stipulation to this effect, but as a result of an internationally consecrated satellisation of a state holding a geographical key position in the area.[9] It was in this way that Yalta has become the foundation of the Soviet colonial empire in Europe.[10] This is why the USSR clings to the Yalta decisions with the utmost tenacity and violently reacts to all attempts to reopen the question.

(b) This situation has given rise to the widespread myth of a Yalta partition of Europe into spheres of influence. The myth does not correspond to reality. Yalta has indeed divided Europe into a vast Soviet-dominated area and one that is not Soviet-dominated; but this has been done not by a parallel attribution of respective spheres of influence to the participating powers, but by the Western allies condoning unilateral Soviet expansion. Neither in their text nor by their implications do the Yalta decisions provide for either territorial gains by or a hegemony of the Anglo-Saxon powers in Western Europe.

This remains true in spite of the fact that the idea of spheres of influence did in fact time and again appear in the course of the Western-Soviet negotiations during the war. Suggestions to this effect originated with the USSR, in the obvious intention of strengthening its own expansionist case.[11] Such suggestions were met with the same vacillations as were all other Soviet demands, ranging from straight refusal [12] through partial acceptance, qualified as a matter of military responsibility and for a limited period of time [13] to downright local

The so-called "Protocol of Proceedings, released only on 24 March 1947, repeated textually the decisions mentioned above under (5), (6), and (7), as well as the decisions under (8) in a slightly abridged form, while carrying moreover an enlarged section on World Organisation, a distinct section on the dismemberment of Germany, though with no precise indications and subject to future study, a distinct section on the French zone of occupation in Germany as well as the French participation in the Control Council for Germany, and finally an enlarged section on German reparations. Furthermore, the questions of major war criminals, the Italo-Yugoslav and the Italo-Austrian frontiers, relations between Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, South Eastern Europe, Iran, the Montreux Convention and the question of the Straits were mentioned as problems for further study and consideration. A separate protocol on German reparations was attached. The agreement regarding entry of the Soviet Union into the war against Japan was classified top secret and was released only on 11 February 1946. Finally, a bilateral agreement between the United States and the USSR concerning liberated prisoners of war and civilian persons was released on 8 March 1946. deals of sordid character.[14] While such developments should in no case be glossed over, the general context would seem to indicate that what was at stake for the Western powers was less an actual establishment of their own spheres of influence than an attempt to set limits to growing Soviet expansion. This led to differing results such agreements being in some cases respected,[15] and other disregarded.[16]

The myth of Yalta partition of Europe into two spheres of influence founders equally on further developments and on the present day situation. Indeed, what has come to be known as the two blocs or alliance systems, is not comparable. As already mentioned, there are neither territorial gains by the Anglo-Saxon powers in Europe, nor any sort of hegemony. Great Britain is anyway no longer a world power and the United States heads an alliance system within which she is confronted not with vessel states but with authentic and, at times, very difficult allies. This system is based on a free decision of its members. France and Greece were free to leave the military organization of NATO without American tanks rolling into Paris or Athens and every Western European state is free to determine its own political, social and economic system without facing the danger of "normalisation". The existing division of Europe must be seen for what it is: a monolithic empire in the East from which no secession is permitted and within which no deviation, however slight, is tolerated, and a free alliance of heterogenous states in the West, with freedom of decisions, diverging interests and, all too often, conflicting policies.

THE LEGAL ASPECTS OF THE YALTA DECISIONS

The Yalta decisions have been described by a prominent American international lawyer as a "legal monstrosity".[17] They certainly stand unique in the history of international instruments both in form and in contents.

As regards from, they lack all normal characteristics of an international treaty, even by most lenient standards. However great the flexibility of international law in matters of form, some minimum requirements have yet to be met for an instrument so to qualify. Thus, an international treaty, whatever its designation—treaty, convention, agreement, protocol, etc.—is an agreement between two or more subjects of international law, giving rise to rights and obligations under that law; it is not an agreement between individuals, however elevated their rank.

Nowhere in the Yalta decisions is there any mention of the participating states. They are couched in the form of personal understandings between three highly placed political figures, speaking in their own name/"we have considered", "we have agreed", "we came", "we discussed"/, in the absence of any indication of their acting as organs of their respective states. They thus bear such a personal character as to prompt the question "whether the United States, in contrast possibly to President Roosevelt, was ever legally bound upon signature of the agreement by the latter." [18] Nor do the Yalta decisions carry any of the usual final clauses determining the coming into force of the treaty, its duration, termination, possible denunciation, etc. In fact, the decisions did not provide for ratification without at the same time indicating their entry into force upon signature. While purporting to deal with problems of general interest, they do not carry an accession clause and were in fact not acceded to be any other state.[19]

As regards contents, the instruments are a monument of obscurity, couched in a language of political proclamations, rarely encountered in legal acts, full of general statements with no discernible normative meaning and abounding in ambiguous qualifications—"democratic", "free and unfettered", "peace-loving", etc.—which were bound to give rise to widely differing interpretations, especially in the obvious absence of any common value judgment. This, by the way, is exactly what was to happen long after the Yalta conference. It is finally totally unclear what precise rights and obligations arise out of these decisions for the contracting parties, through this may result from the fact that these deal mostly with rights and obligations of third states—Poland, China, Yugoslavia, etc.

The participants at the Yalta conference chose, however, to qualify ex post the Yalta decisions as an international treaty and it must be conceded that they were free to do so. It was on the strength of such qualifications that the Western powers were repeatedly to accuse the Soviet Union of its violation.

But if that is so, and if the Yalta decisions in fact constitute a treaty, then it is a treaty tainted ab initio with illegality, being concluded in violation both of the basic principle of general international law according to which no state can, without its consent, be deprived of its rights by other states and also of an impressive list of existing treaties to which the Yalta participants were contracting parties.[20]

Summing up: on all generally accepted criteria, the treaty character of the Yalta decisions is subject to doubt; on the authentic interpretation of the contracting parties, it is not. On either assumption, the way is free for putting an end to Yalta: for either the decisions do not constitute an international treaty and thus have no legal existence whatsoever; or else, they do constitute such a treaty binding on the three contracting parties, but have been, as forcefully asserted by the two Western powers, repeatedly violated by the Soviet Union and are thus ripe for denunciation on the strength of the general principle of international, as of any law, that of inadempenti non est adimplendum, i.e. termination of the treaty on account of its violation by the contracting party.[21]

Thus there is no legal obstacle to ending the Yalta decisions for their participants; for the third states, Yalta anyway was and remains a res inter alios acta—a matter settled between other parties.

CONCLUSION

The Yalta decisions, spelling the enslavement of half of Europe, did not even bring about the expected peace and security for the rest of the world. On the contrary, the division of Europe became the source of permanent unbalance and tension. Moreover, the Soviet domination of Central-East Europe turned out to be not a final satisfaction of Soviet claims but a mere springboard for further Soviet expansion which is nowadays spreading over all continents.

Last but not least, the situation created in Central-East Europe as a result of Yalta keeps on being dramactically contested by its victims. East Berlin 1953, Poznan 1956, Budapest 1956, Prague 1968 and Poland 1970 and again 1980-81, bear witness to the determination of the enslaved peoples of that region to re-assert the rights of which they have been deprived. Nothing indicates that this process will stop, sparing the Western world recurring crises and even greater tensions. The end of Yalta is therefore in the common interest of those who are already enslaved and those who are still free.

Admittedly, the situation of fact prevailing in Central-East Europe will not cease by a mere withdrawal of its legal or pseudo-legal basis. Such withdrawal would, however, represent an immense moral and political asset in the shaping of new policies aimed at bringing about an effective change in Europe and the world. It is long overdue.

[18] Briggs, op. cit., p. 380. While not concluded under Article 2, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution, requiring the "advice and consent of the Senate", the Yalta decisions could of course have fallen into the category of executive agreements for which such advice and consent are not required. Concerning the Far Eastern part of the decisions, Prof. Briggs held, however, that they "contain commitments of such uncertain meaning and doubtful duration as to raise serious doubts as to the President's constitutional competence to commit the United States by executive agreement." Ibid., p. 381. Here again, "uncertain meaning" and "doubtful duration" are characteristic of the whole of the Yalta packet and not only of its Far Eastern part.

tors MELCHER, BOREN, PRYOR, STAFFORD, and PROXMIRE, legislation to maintain the support price of milk constant from April 1, 1985, to September 30, 1985. The joint resolution will remove the threat of a potentially disruptive and ill-advised reduction in the milk support price, while dairy farmers consider the kind of program needed in the new farm bill.

Specifically, the joint resolution will eliminate the discretionary authority for the Secretary of Agriculture to reduce the support price of milk on July 1. It will not require an increase in the support price.

CURRENT SITUATION

Under the provisions of Public Law 98-180, the Dairy Production Stabilization Act of 1983, the support price of milk was reduced from $13.10 per hundredweight to $12.60 per hundredweight, effective December 1, 1983. On April 1, 1985, the Secretary can reduce the support price of milk by 50 cents, to $12.10 per hundredweight, if he estimates that net price support purchases of milk or milk products during the 12-month period beginning on April 1 will exceed 6 billion pounds—milk equivalent—but the 50-cent-per-hundredweight fee levied against all milk produced in the United States will be removed.

The Secretary can also make an adjustment in the support price of milk on July 1, 1985. If the Secretary estimates that net price support purchases of milk or milk products during the 12-month period beginning on July 1 will exceed 5 billion pounds—milk equivalent—he can reduce the price support rate in effect on July 1, by 50 cents per hundredweight. The Secretary retains his authority to increase the support rate to ensure an adequate supply of milk.

This possible reduction on July 1 is unwise policy for several reasons, and this legislation is directed toward eliminating the authority for the reduction.

PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION ARE BECOMING EQUAL

Milk production in 1984 was down 3 percent from 1983 while milk and dairy product sales increased about 3 percent. As a result, net purchases by the Commodity Credit Corporation declined by nearly 50 percent from the previous year.

Dairy producers have achieved these results by reducing feed rations, going from three to two milkings per day, milking first calf heifers, slaughtering cows, and stepping up promotional efforts. Dairy producers have taken these actions at their own expense.

Many people are encouraged by the success of recent efforts and believe that these actions will result in a better balance between production and use without substantial change in the program provisions.

COMPREHENSIVE PROGRAM NEEDED

Mr. President, the writing of the 1985 farm bill will begin soon. That bill will establish a new dairy program after October 1, 1985.

Based on meetings and conversations I have had with Vermont dairy farmers, I believe that, while there is still a wide range of opinion concerning the specific provisions of the new program, many of the objectives of a new program are already clear to farmers and to others who are involved with the dairy industry.

I will be working with my colleagues on the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry to see that the new bill takes these objectives into account.

The dairy program in the new farm bill should be a long-term, enduring program that will not invite or require year-by-year adjustment by Congress. Dairy farmers deserve a program that allows realistic planning.

The program should protect family farmers by seeing that they do not have to operate under unrealistic programs. In my home State of Vermont, most farms are small and family operated. They are increasingly disadvantaged by persistent high interest charges and other costs of producing. The administration's command to—"get big or get out"—could lead to scores of bankruptcies in Vermont.

Increasing domestic use of milk and dairy products is a key feature of any program that intends to address the long-term needs of dairy producers. I hope that the new dairy program will make increases in consumption a major objective. Many of Vermont's dairy farmers tell me that milk isn't overproduced—it's undersold.

U.S. dairy farmers are hurt by unfair import competition. At the same time, the efforts of the administration to develop overseas markets for domestically produced dairy products are disappointing. Certainly more can be done to use the abundance of milk products to relieve the famine in Africa and other parts of the world.

Unity on dairy policy is a chief objective of many dairy farmers in Vermont. They would like to see a broad agreement among dairy farmers, in Vermont and elsewhere, about a new dairy policy. To get this broad agreement, we in Congress will have to reach out for the best advice from our dairy farmers. I have had many meetings with dairy farmers in Vermont, and I intend to hold many more.

Vermont dairy farmers are aware of the past criticisms of the milk price support program. They recognize the dangers of overly generous price support program provisions that encourage production solely for Government warehouses. They want to avoid such dangers, and agree with the need to hold down the cost of Federal programs. At the same time, no one wants a support price cuts that can drive many family farms out of business.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, I believe that adoption of this joint resolution will improve the prospects for a sensible debate on the dairy program needed in the new farm bill. I urge my colleagues to support it. Also, I invite Senators to join me in working for a new dairy program in the 1985 farm bill that will meet the needs of dairy farmers and address the concerns raised by critics of current programs.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. Res. 38. Joint resolution authorizing and requesting the President to designate the week of March 10 through 16, 1985, as "National Employ the Older Worker Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL EMPLOY THE OLDER WORKER WEEK

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce today, together with the ranking minority member of the Aging Committee, Senator GLENN, and numerous cosponsors, a joint resolution to authorize and designate the week of March 10 through 16, 1985, "National Employ the Older Worker Week." The chairman and ranking minority members of the House Select Committee on Aging, Representatives ROYBAL and RINALDO, along with Representative PEPPER, are also introducing this resolution in the House of Representatives.

Our resolution calls attention to both the potential of older workers and some of the problems which block employment opportunity for them. The American Legion has sponsored such a week for older workers every year since 1959, joining with local American Legion posts, State and area agencies on aging, the National Council on Aging, the American Association of Retired Persons, and Senior Community Service Employment Program sponsors to focus attention on the advantages of employing older persons. The American Legion has presented citations to employers who have promoted successful programs for hiring and retraining older workers within their organizations.

Special programs will be held around the country to mark this important week and to encourage employers to generate employment opportunities for older persons. Employers will become more aware of job opportunities and job retention options.

Mr. President, the trends and the demographics are clear. We need to look to the future and prepare for the inevitable work force changes that will occur. Our Nation will need these productive older workers. As you are aware, Mr. President, age discrimination of the population will be shifting dramatically over the coming decades. The population of the younger—16 to 44—working-age population has ceased growing and will remain a constant number for nearly two decades. The enormous baby boom generation will retire with fewer younger people in the work force and fewer to contribute to their support. Unless we convince older workers to stay productive members of the work force, we will not have the necessary labor force to produce what this country must to support today's—let alone a rising—standard of living. Not only are we wasting valuable human resources, but failure to adapt work patterns to the needs of older workers will take a serious toll on the economic well-being of our entire society.

Older workers today represent a large but neglected national resource. Only 14 percent of individuals between 55 and 64 are presently in the labor force. More than 770,000 Americans 55 and over are out of work—1.1 million if one adds to the "officially unemployed" the so-called discouraged older workers who have withdrawn from the labor force unwillingly because they simply could not find jobs and eventually gave up looking for them. These unemployed and discouraged older workers often have greater financial obligations than younger workers do. Many workers in their fifties have children in college whom they must support. Mortgage and car payments as well as other financial commitments often rise with a worker's age and income. Many older unemployed workers cannot begin to draw a pension because they worked for a company that lacked one or because they have not met the age and service requirements. They do not become eligible for Social Security's reduced early retirement benefits until age 62, nor for Medicare until age 65. Once unemployed, the older worker runs the greatest risk of being without work for long periods of time. People 55 and over are out of work on the average nearly 20 weeks before being reemployed. That is 23 percent longer than the 15.5 weeks between jobs, on the average, for all unemployed Americans.

Mr. President, older people want to work. National polls and research findings indicate that many more would like to find full- or part-time jobs, but feel that the opportunity is not there.

Three out of four retirees in a 1981 Harris survey stated that they wished they had never quit work. Futher, the poll found that among all those now working in the key preretirement age between 55 and 64, a majority of 79 percent are proposed to stopping work completely when they retire. And surveys show that 90 percent of Americans disapproved of mandatory retirement.

Some employers are already recognizing older workers as a resource. They are initiating hiring, retraining, second career and job retention programs for older workers. These progessive companies, large and small, deserve to be recognized as examples for others to follow. There are still too many other employers who do not perceive older workers in such a positive light and continue to practice, consciously or unconsciously, age discrimination against them.

Mr. President, I realize that this resolution is just a small step, but it is a step that is worth taking now to help dramatize the need for action. As chairman of the Special Committee on Aging, I will be working toward the development of substantive policies to promote greater employment opportunities. I believe that we can no longer ignore the vast potential contribution that these Americans are capable and desirous of making to our society. The results of this promotional week will benefit older workers, employers, and the Nation as a whole. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 38

Whereas individuals aged fifty-five and over are a major national resource, constitute 21 per centum of the population of the United States at the present time, and will constitute a larger percentage of the population in future decades;

Whereas a growing number of such individuals, being willing and able to work, are looking for employment opportunities, want to remain in the work force, and would like to serve their communities and their Nation in productive roles;

Whereas such individuals, who have made continuing contributions to the national welfare, should be encouraged to remain in, or resume, career and voluntary roles that utilize their strengths, wisdom, and skills;

Whereas employers who retain older workers or rehire older former employees report that such workers and employees exhibit greater company loyalty, high levels of job performance, and low rates of absenteeism; and

Whereas The American Legion has sponsored a "National Employ the Older Worker Week" during the second full week of March in every year since 1959, focusing public attention on the advantages of employing older individuals: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to designate the week of March 10 through 16, 1985, as "National Employ the Older Worker Week", and to issue a proclamation calling upon—

(1) the employers and labor unions of the United States to give special consideration to older workers, with a view toward expanding career and employment opportunities for older workers who are willing and able to work and who desire to remain employed or to reenter the work force;

(2) voluntary organizations to reexamine the many fine service programs which they sponsor with a view toward expanding both the number of older volunteers and the types of service roles open to older workers;

(3) the United States Department of Labor to give special assistance to older workers by means of job training programs under the Jobs Training and Partnership Act, job counseling through the United States Employment Service, and additional support through its older worker program, as authorized by title V of the Older Americans Act; and

(4) the citizens of the United States to observe this day with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.●

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues in introducing this resolution to designate the week of March 10, 1985, as "National Employ the Older Worker Week." Older workers have contributed much to our Nation in the past and continue to enrich our society through their services. They deserve our recognition and support. I appreciate the efforts of the American Legion in sponsoring such a week for older workers.

Citizens age 55 and over, who constitute 21 percent of our population, are a major national resource. Many of these persons do not want to stop work completely upon retirement, but desire to continue working part time, full time, or on a voluntary basis. We should encourage these persons to reenter or remain in the work force, for we can all benefit from their wisdom, skills and experience.

The aging of the American work force will be a prominent issue facing both Congress and employers during the coming decade. The bulk of our current work force is the group of younger workers aged 16 to 44, but this group will peak in numbers around 1990 and then begin to decline. In order to sustain economic growth and productivity, we must look to the pool of middle-aged and older persons. Yet, our current Social Security and pension policies encourage early retirement and overlook the positive contributions that older workers are capable of making. We must adapt these programs to the demographics of the aging work force.

I would also like to accentuate the positive contributions that middle-aged and older women are making to the American work force. I recently chaired a hearing of the Senate Special Committee on Aging in Columbus, OH, on "Women in Our Aging Society." The purpose of the hearing was to examine the changing roles of women in American society and to identify the issues that must be addressed in order to plan ahead for the 21st century. One of the issues we discussed was the growing participation of women in the work force. Women now account for 53 percent of the American work force, as compared to just 32 percent in 1960. Middle-aged women are the fastest growing segment of our labor force and their contributions will be even more critical in the years ahead when we will confront a shortage of younger skilled workers. But these women often face an uphill battle in gaining the necessary job skills and combating age discrimination. One of our witnesses at the hearing, Mrs. Marjorie Jenks of Columbus, OH, told her story of reentering the work force in her midforties after raising four children:

My 40's were years in which I began to discover myself again. I became something other than someone's mother. My confidence and job skills improved, and by the time I was 50, I was ready to move to a better paying position.

I felt well, and it never really occurred to me that anyone would find me too old to hire. I just never thought of it. I began answering advertisements in the newspaper for which I could meet and even exceed the requirements. However, after giving my employment history and dates either over the phone or by mail, I was never called for an interview. This puzzled me because there was supposedly a shortage of qualified secretaries.

I remember then how when I was in my middle 20's and worked in a law office, we used to run ads for secretaries stating they had to be 35 years or under. I began to wonder why I hadn't questioned that policy.

Finally, I simply presented myself at the personnel office of a very large international corporation which had opened a large facility near my home. Many of the graduates from the high school at which I worked were obtaining clerical jobs there as salaries higher than what I was making after 7 years. I interviewed with a clever personnel officer who told me that though there were entry level jobs available, I would not be happy working there as I was overqualified, and they had very few jobs which required skills as good as mine. She was so clever that it wasn't until I was in the car on the way home that I realized that I had not said I didn't want an entry level job. She said I didn't want it. I smiled to myself when in the last month or so I picked up the newspaper and saw an article saying that this company has been accused of a longstanding policy of age discrimination. I now doubt that they wanted to put me under their pension plan at age 50.

I finally heard of a secretarial opening with a State agency through a friend. I was interviewed, was hired and have been employed there for 6 years now as an administrative secretary. Although I do like my job, there is nevertheless the knowledge that this is probably it. I cannot conceive of going out into the job market again at 57.

Mrs. Jenks offered a good example of both the problems encountered by older workers and the opportunities available to them. We must continue to support programs which train and employ middle-aged and older workers, such as the Older Americans Act Title V Program and the Job Training Partnership Act. These programs enable older persons to remain self-sufficient and independent. I have introduced legislation to establish a job training trust fund to enable displaced workers to acquire the necessary skills for employment in today's economy.

I urge my colleagues to join me in recognizing the past, present, and future contributions of older workers, by supporting this resolution for "Employ the Older Worker Week."●

S.J. Res. 40. Joint resolution to designate the month of October 1985 as "National Down Syndrome Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL DOWN SYNDROME MONTH

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, it is my pleasure today to introduce again this year, along with a number of my colleagues, a joint resolution to designate the month of October 1985 as "National Down Syndrome Month."

Down syndrome occurs once in every 1,000 births. It results from a genetic mishap in which an extra chromosome No. 21, that affects physical and mental development, is found within the individual's genetic material. For years Down syndrome carried the stigma of being a hopeless impediment to a meaningful and productive life. In fact, early literature on children with Down syndrome indicated that their development plateaued by age 5.

Happily, the past 15 years have brought a revolution in terms of discovering the potential for individuals with Down syndrome. Significant medical advances have enabled correction of a number of the congenital disorders associated with Down syndrome which have impeded normal functioning in society. Moreover, infant stimulation programs being taught to new parents of babies with Down syndrome, have increased intellectual development far beyond previous expectations.

Mr. President, since enactment of Public Law 94-142, we can see the rewards of educating the developmentally disabled in our public schools, both in terms of their increased achievements and consequently, the contributions that these children will make to society in the future as productive citizens.

An integral part of this process has been the fostering of public awareness, the dissolution of old stereotypes and stigmas about Down syndrome, and an acceptance of these individuals into the mainstream of our society. Mr. President, given the tremendous success of October 1984 as National Down Syndrome Month, I am confident that this resolution will again contribute to that education and acceptance and I urge my colleagues to join as cosponsors of this measure.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 40

Whereas the past decade has brought a greater and more enlightened attitude in the care and training of the developmentally disabled;

Whereas one such condition which has undergone considerable reevaluation is that of Down syndrome—a problem which, just a short time ago, was often stigmatized as a mentally retarded condition which relegated its victims to lives of passivity in institutions and back rooms;

Whereas, through the efforts of concerned physicians, teachers and parent groups such as the National Down Syndrome Congress, programs are being put in place to educate new parents of babies with Down syndrome; to develop special education classes within mainstreamed programs in schools; the provision for vocational training in preparation for competitive employment in the work force and to prepare young adults with Down syndrome for independent living in the community.

Whereas the cost of such services designed to help individuals with Down syndrome move into their rightful place in our society is but a tiny fraction of the cost of institutionalization;

Whereas along with this improvement in educational opportunities for those with Down syndrome is the advancement in medical science which is adding to a more brightened outlook for individuals born with this chromosomal configuration; and

Whereas public awareness and acceptance of the capabilities of children with Down syndrome can greatly facilitate their being mainstreamed in our society: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That October 1985 is designated "National Down Syndrome Month" and that the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the designated month with appropriate programs, ceremonies and activities.●

By Mr. INOUYE:

S.J. Res. 42. Joint resolution to consent to an amendment enacted by the legislature of the State of Hawaii to the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act, 1920; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

CONSENT TO AN AMENDMENT TO THE HAWAIIAN HOMES COMMISSION ACT, 1920

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, today I have introduced a measure to give the necessary consent of Congress to amendments to the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act which have been recommended and adopted by the State of Hawaii. These amendments reduce the blood quantum requirement for a Hawaiian homestead lessee's spouse or children to assume his unexpired homestead interest upon his death from 50 to 25 percent Hawaiian. They also limit the Hawaiian Homes Commission's authority to designate a successor if a lessee dies without having designated a successor.

In 1920, by the passage of the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act, the U.S. Congress dedicated approximately 200,000 acres of Government lands to a homesteading program for persons of at least 50 percent Hawaiian ancestry. Under this program, the Hawaiian Homes Commission was authorized to:

First, lease residential, agricultural or pastoral lots to eligible Hawaiians for 99-year periods at a rental of $1 per year;

Second, offer financial assistance to individual homesteaders through low-interest loans for agricultural development and home construction; and Third, provide agricultural and other experts to aid the homesteaders in developing their farms and ranches. Such leases have been, and continue to be, made.

When Hawaii became a State in 1959, Congress required, as a condition of admission, that the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act become a provision of the Hawaii State Constitution. In addition, title to Hawaiian Homes lands, and responsibilities for the administering of the act were transferred to the State. However, the amendment of certain provisions of the act remained subject to the approval of the U.S. Government. Included among these provisions are those sections relating to the qualifications of lessees and their successors. The measure I am introducing today is thus necessary to ratify the State of Hawaii's decision to reduce the blood quantum requirement for a spouse or child to succeed an original lessee's homestead interest.

The Hawaiian Homes Commission Act presently requires that successors to unexpired terms of Hawaiian home lands leases must be of at least 50 percent Hawaiian ancestry. In many instances, however, original homesteaders have spouses who are nonnative Hawaiians so that neither the homesteader's spouse nor offspring have the minimum blood requirement to qualify as successors. The death of a lessee thus often results in the eviction of his wife and children.

The lawmakers of the State of Hawaii are convinced that this situation threatens family stability and security and frustrates the intent of the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act. They have concluded that the native Hawaiian lessees should be provided with assurances that his closest family may succeed him in order to encourage stability and the improvement of property as well as to avoid inhumane results. It is to be emphasized, however, that the proposed relaxing of the blood requirement applies only to the surviving spouse and children so that all other successors to homestead leases will have to meet the existing 50 percent criteria.

Another concern reflected in the measure is that if a lessee dies without having designated a successor, the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act currently requires that the Department select a successor from among the lessee's spouse, children, widow or widowers of children, grandchildren, brothers, and sisters, widows or widowers of brothers and sisters, or nieces and nephews. Should the Department be successful in contacting all qualified relatives, the Hawaiian Homes Commission must, somehow, select the successor. This has not been an easy task because of the problems it has caused within family units. The language hereby submitted for approval therefore limits selection by the Commission of a qualified successor to a spouse, or if none, then the children. If there are neither spouse nor children, the lease will be canceled. This places the onus on the lessee to designate a successor.

Mr. President, this measure represents the first time that the State of Hawaii has sought the consent of Congress for amendments to the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act. These amendments, passed as Act 272 of the 1982 Hawaii State Legislature, have been carefully debated and reviewed on the State level and I believe represents a reasonable means of forwarding the purposes of the original act. A Federal-State Task Force on the Hawaiian Homes Commission, composed of representatives of the Hawaiian community and Federal Department of Interior, after careful examination of the matter, have also recommended Federal consent to these amendments. I therefore urge my colleagues to act favorably on this measure and ask unanimous consent that the full text of the measure be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 42

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, as required by section 4 of the Act entitled "An Act to provide for the admission of the State of Hawaii into the Union", approved March 18, 1959 (73 Stat. 4), the United States hereby consents to the amendment enacted by the legislature of the State of Hawaii and approved by the Governor of such State on June 18, 1982, to section 209 of the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act, 1920.●

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. WARNER, and Mr. TRIBLE):

S.J. Res. 43. Joint resolution to authorize the Armored Force Monument Committee, the United States Armor Association, the World Wars Tank Corps Association, the Veterans of the Battle of the Bulge, the 11th Armored Cavalry Regiment Association, the Tank Destroyer Association, the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, and 16th Armored Division Associations, and the Council of Armored Division Associations jointly to erect a memorial to the American Armored Force on U.S. Government property in Arlington, VA, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

AMERICAN ARMORED FORCE MEMORIAL MONUMENT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, once again, joined by my distinguished colleagues from Virginia, Senators WARNER and TRIBLE, I am pleased today to reintroduce a joint resolution to authorize the erection of a memorial in Arlington, VA, for the purpose of honoring those men of "flesh and steel" who have honorably served their country as members of the American Armored Force, during World Wars I and II, the Korean and Vietnam wars, as well as those who are currently serving in comparable fighting units worldwide.

The measure I am today introducing is identical to Senate Joint Resolution 277, which passed the Senate during the 98th Congress on a unanimous voice vote. Unfortunately, the House was unable to consider the resolution prior to sine die adjournment.

Mr. President, this proposal has the endorsement, among others, of the Armored Force Monument Committee and its eminent chairman, Gen. Bruce C. Clarke (U.S. Army, retired). It has the support of the United States Armor Association; the World Wars Tank Corps Association; the Veterans of the Battle of the Bulge; the 11th Armored Cavalry Regiment Association, the Tank Destroyer Association; the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, and 16th Armored Division Associations.

Simply stated, this joint resolution would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to select, with the approval of the National Commission of Fine Arts and the National Capital Commission, a suitable site for this memorial in Arlington, VA. With private donors assuming the cost of erecting the monument, the only expense to the U.S. Government would be that incurred by the Interior Department for the maintenance and care of the memorial area.

Mr. President, one of the finest chapters in the epic history of the U.S. Army has been the story of the American Armored Force. This great military force had its beginning when Gen. "Black Jack" Pershing established the U.S. Army Tank Corps during World War I. Col. George Patton commanded one of the first tank brigades at the time when the American tankers received their first baptism of fire in the battle of St. Mihiel. Between the two World Wars, U.S. Army visionaries, like General Van Voorhis and Gen. Adna Chaffee, labored mightily to mechanize and modernize the U.S. Army. In January 1940, Gen. George C. Marshall brought fruition to their labors by creating the American Armored Force.

It was this American Armored Force that provided the powerful armored units. This force was composed of armored divisions, mechanized cavalry groups, separate armored field artillery, tank destroyer, and tank and armored infantry battalions, all of which contributed substantially to the victory of American arms in all the theaters of war in World War II.

Mr. President, this is the same American Armored Force that provided the basis of the Armored infantry, armored cavalry, armored artillery, armored engineers, armored signal and tank units that were an integral part of the success achieved by our forces in the many battles fought in the Korean and Vietnam wars.

Mr. President, it is an honor and a personal pleasure for me, along with my colleagues, Senators WARNER and TRIBLE, to once again introduce this joint resolution to authorize the erection of a monument honoring the American Armored Force. This memorial will signify permanent recognition by a grateful nation for heroic achievements in combat against aggression. I urge that this measure be given early and favorable consideration.

At the request of Mr. D'AMATO, the names of the Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HECHT], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON], and the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA] were added as cosponsors of S. 207, a bill concerning vandalism of religious property.

At the request of Mr. D'AMATO, the name of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] was added as a cosponsor of S. 209, a bill to amend chapter 37 of title 31, United States Code, to authorize contracts retaining private counsel to furnish collection services in the case of indebtedness owed the United States.

S. 210

At the request of Mr. D'AMATO, the name of the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] was added as a cosponsor of S. 210, a bill to repeal the inclusion of tax-exempt interest from the calculation determining the taxation of Social Security benefits.

S. 233

At the request of Mr. D'AMATO, the name of the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN] was added as a cosponsor of S. 233, a bill to provide for the minting of coins in commemoration of the centennial of the Statue of Liberty.

S. 235

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, the names of the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. MATTINGLY] were added as cosponsors of S. 235, a bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to prohibit employment in civil service positions in the executive branch of any individual required to register under the Military Selective Service Act who has not yet registered.

S. 260

At the request of Mr. HEINZ, the names of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. TRIBLE], the Senator from Florida [Mr. CHILES], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] were added as cosponsors of S. 260, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that the substantiation requirements of section 274(d) of such code may be met, in the case of passenger automobiles and other transportation property, if the taxpayer provides substantial evidence other than contemporaneous records.

S. 267

At the request of Mr. SPECTER, the name of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ] was added as a cosponsor of S. 267, a bill to authorize the implementation of a project for the control of beach erosion at Presque Isle Peninsula, PA, and for other purposes.

S. 268

At the request of Mr. SPECTER, the name of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ] was added as a cosponsor of S. 268, a bill to authorize the implementation of a project for the prevention of flood damage on the west branch of the Susquehanna River at Lock Haven, PA, and for other purposes.

S. 269

At the request of Mr. SPECTER, the name of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ] was added as a cosponsor of S. 269, a bill to authorize implementation of a project for the prevention of flood damage in Wyoming Valley, Luzerne County, PA, for other purposes.

S. 270

At the request of Mr. SPECTER, the name of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ] was added as a cosponsor of S. 270, a bill to authorize the implementation of a project for the prevention of flood damage on the Susquehanna River at Harrisburg, PA, and for other purposes.

S. 271

At the request of Mr. SPECTER, the name of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ] was added as a cosponsor of S. 271, a bill to authorize implementation of a project for flood damage prevention at Milton, PA.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ] be added as an original sponsor at the next printing of the following bills:

S. 267. Erosion Control Project at Presque Isle (Erie) Pennsylvania.

S. 268. Flood Control Project at Lock Haven, Pennsylvania.

S. 269. Flood Control Project at Wyoming Valley, Luzerne County, Pennsylvania.

S. 270. Flood Control Project at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

S. 271. Flood Control Project at Milton, Pennsylvania.

Unfortunately, Senator HEINZ' name was inadvertently omitted from the first printing of these bills.

As I said in my statement (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 24, 1985, pages S554-S555), I was reintroducing this legislation "for Senator HEINZ and myself."

S. 299

At the request of Mr. CHILES, the names of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BINGAMAN], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BOSCHWITZ], the Senator from California [Mr. CRANSTON], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SASSER], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER] were added as cosponsors of S. 299, a bill to provide for the release of Interstate construction and Interstate substitution funds.

S. 318

At the request of Mr. HEINZ, the names of the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE], the Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] were added as cosponsors of S. 318, a bill to extend the revenue sharing program for local governments through fiscal year 1991.

S. 329

At the request of Mr. HECHT, the name of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] was added as a cosponsor of S. 329, a bill entitled the Highway Speed Modification Act of 1985.

S. 339

At the request of Mr. LAUTENBERG, the names of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHAFEE], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BOSCHWITZ], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] were added as cosponsors of S. 339, a bill to implement the Rule of the Shorter Term in the case of computer programs.

S. 367

At the request of Mr. HART, the names of the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BUMPERS], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON] were added as cosponsors of S. 367, a bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to establish certain procedures for the adjudication of claims for benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration; to apply the provisions of section 553 of title 5, United States Code, to rulemaking procedures of the Veterans' Administration; to provide for judicial review of certain final decisions of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs; to provide for the payment of reasonable fees to attorneys for rendering legal representation to individuals claiming benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration; and for other purposes.

S. 370

At the request of Mr. MELCHER, the name of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY] was added as a cosponsor of S. 370, a bill to make available supplemental assistance for famine relief and recovery in Africa.

S. 374

At the request of Mr. PRESSLER, the name of the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA] was added as a cosponsor of S. 374, a bill to provide authorization of appropriations for the United States Travel and Tourism Administration.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 29

At the request of Mr. GLENN, the names of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 29, a joint resolution to designate the week of November 11, 1985, through November 17, 1985, as "National Reye's Syndrome Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 33

At the request of Mr. MATTINGLY, the name of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 33, a joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate May 12, 1985 to June 16, 1985, as "Family Reunion Month."

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 4

At the request of Mr. MOYNIHAN, the names of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BINGAMAN] were added as cosponsors of Senate Concurrent Resolution 4, a concurrent resolution calling on the President to appoint a special envoy for northern Ireland.

SENATE RESOLUTION 34

At the request of Mr. D'AMATO, the names of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY], the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. DENTON], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTEN], the Senator from Maine [Mr. MITCHELL], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PRESSLER], the Senator from Maine [Mr. COHEN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HECHT], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. MATTINGLY] were added as cosponsors of Senate Resolution 34, a resolution condemning the government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics for 5 years of forced and oppressive military occupation of Afghanistan in the face of popular resistance to Soviet imperialism.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 9—COMMENDING THE SUCCESS OF THE MEDICARE PROGRAM

Mr. HEINZ (for himself, Mr. GLENN, Mr. WILSON, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. CHILES, Mr. DOLE, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. DODD, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. SIMON, and Mr. RIEGLE) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. CON. RES. 9

Whereas Congress authorized Medicare in 1965 under title XVIII of the Social Security Act to consist of Hospital Insurance and Supplemental Medical Insurance;

Whereas Medicare has contributed immeasurably to the security, improved health and extended longevity of older Americans;

Whereas Medicare provides health insurance coverage to 31 million aged and disabled persons, and is the largest personal health care financing program in the United States;

Whereas over half of all physicians serve Medicare patients, and over 20,000 organizations—hospitals, nursing homes, home health agencies, labs and clinics participate in Medicare;

Whereas Medicare is one of the most vitally important and successful programs in the history of the United States, without which many older Americans could not afford basic health care;

Whereas one of the greatest social issues facing our nation today is maintaining the integrity of Medicare to ensure the health and well-being of all older Americans: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That Medicare be commended on its 20th anniversary for the program's success in helping to protect older Americans against the high cost of health care.

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am proud to offer today, along with 20 cosponsors, a Senate concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the Medicare Program be commended on its 20th anniversary for the program's success in protecting older Americans against the high cost of health care.

This year marks the 20th anniversary of the enactment of the Social Security Amendments of 1965, creating a new title XVIII to provide health insurance coverage to older Americans against the cost of acute care. Medicare was destined not only to become one of the most important contributions to security in old age, but also the key to strengthening the safety net established by Social Security 30 years earlier. Medicare guaranteed that most older Americans would have the needed hospital insurance protection they deserved.

Since its enactment, Medicare has contributed immeasurably to the improved health and well-being of older Americans by helping to ensure access to appropriate and affordable health care. Over the years, Congress has expanded eligibility to include certain disabled persons under age 65 and individuals suffering from chronic renal failure. Congress has also responded to the need for less costly, more appropriate health care services by enhancing benefits to include hospice and health maintenance organization [HMO] services. In 1967, Medicare's first year of operation, the program served 19 million older persons. Today, more than 28 million older persons and 3 million disabled persons enjoy insurance protection under Medicare, making it the single largest personal health care financing program in the United States.

The medical community has played a key role in the success of Medicare. Over half of all physicians in the United States serve Medicare patients. More than 20,000 health organizations—hospitals, nursing homes, home health agencies, labs, and clinics—participate in Medicare. Quite simply, without the hard work and dedication of this Nation's health care professionals, we could not begin to meet the health care needs of older and disabled Americans.

Mr. President, Medicare is one of the most vitally important and successful programs in the history of the United States, without which millions of older Americans would be denied access to basic health care services. But the promise of Medicare to assure older Americans access to quality health care without fear of impoverishment is being threatened by skyrocketing health care cost. For the past decade, Congress has attempted to gain control over these rising costs, with only limited success. That is why we must continue to seek ways to solve the looming financial crisis in the Medicare hospital trust fund. We must look at ways to restructure our present health care financing system which are consistent with American values of individual choice, creativity and innovation. It is clear that any serious attempt to restore solvency to Medicare must create a system of incentives for States, hospitals, physicians, insurers, and patients to control health costs.

Unless we take decisive action now, the Medicare program will be rapidly depleted of vital resources and older Americans will be left unprotected. By supporting this resolution, Congress recognizes and salutes the important contribution of Medicare to our Nation's health and security, and demonstrates its firm commitment to maintaining the integrity of the program in the future.

As chairman of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, I am proud to sponsor this concurrent resolution to commemorate the 20th anniversary of Medicare, and to commend Medicare for the program's success in protecting older Americans against the high cost of health care.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 62—OPPOSING CUTS IN EDUCATION PROGRAMS

Mr. BRADLEY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources:

S. RES. 62

Whereas the administration has proposed $170 million in recissions in education programs.

Whereas the administration has proposed an 8.6 per centum reduction in real terms in elementary and secondary education programs and a 32 per centum reduction in real terms in higher education programs in 1986;

Whereas the administration has proposed a 16 per centum reduction in 1986 in real terms in child nutrition programs;

Whereas the administration has proposed a reduction in real terms of 29 per centum for the Department of Education by 1990;

Whereas the administration has proposed a reduction in Department of Education funding in real terms of nearly 45 per centum over the current decade;

Whereas the Nation needs a better educated populace to meet the changing job demands and challenges of the 1980's and beyond; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) the Congress rejects the proposals of the President for further reduction in education programs and

(2) the Congress should provide sufficient resources for education programs to ensure that this Nation will continue in a leadership position in the World.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, today I am submitting a resolution opposing any further cuts in education programs. This resolution is submitted with full awareness that we are confronted by a budget deficit of unprecedented magnitude which cannot go unaddressed. Yet to place the burden of the deficit so heavily and unfairly on these education programs merely invites another deficit the consequences of which would be equally devastating over the long term—an education deficit. The President has proposed $3.5 billion in education cuts for fiscal year 1986 and recissions totaling $174 million. These cuts amount to roughly 9 percent in elementary and secondary education programs, a reduction of 16 percent in child nutrition programs, and a 32-percent reduction in higher education programs. Looking to the future, this budget proposes cutting the Department of Education budget in real terms by 29 percent by 1990, which would result in an accumulated cut of nearly 45 percent during the present decade.

These education programs have taken more than their fair share of cuts already. Further reductions are unconscionable.

Mr. President, we need only compare the proposals in the budget before us with our past commitments to education to realize that these proposals represent a fundamental shift in Federal priorities—a shift that I cannot and will not support. In 1980 we spent over $7.2 billion for elementary and secondary education programs. These programs, however, have been eaten away both by real cuts and by inflation. Compensatory education programs, for example, have been reduced by nearly 20 percent since 1980, and we are being asked to let them erode even further.

How can we continue to whittle away at these programs when over the past several years a national consensus has emerged for higher standards and greater expectations of our youth and their teachers. How can we speak of a commitment to excellence in education and support these drastic cuts? Quite simply, we can't. Federal dollars cannot guarantee excellence, but they are necessary components of the infrastructure which helps support our schools and our youth in their pursuit of excellence. Reductions in Government assistance are hurting our capacity to adequately educate our youth. This is not the time to cut Federal support in real terms by $230 million for compensatory education programs which are targeted to the most needy of our youth. Or to cut vocational education funding by $42 million. Or to slash impact aid payments to hard-hit school districts across the country, including 41 in New Jersey, by 22 percent. These actions will only serve to exacerbate the fiscal burden we have shifted to the States in recent years and erode the quality of the education we provide our youth. This is not the time to cut our support for these educational programs; our children's education needs additional support. And we need to develop new ways—funded adequately—to give our children the skills and chance they need to meet the changing job demands and challenges of the 1980's and beyond.

Mr. President, further cuts in child nutrition are unacceptable. Since 1980 we have witnessed a reduction of over 3 million students in the National School Lunch Program. In New Jersey alone, almost 100,000 fewer students are participating and about 120 schools have dropped out of the program already. Should these proposed cuts be accepted, we are likely to see 87,000 additional children in New Jersey forced out of this program. These cuts are predicated on a misconception regarding the operation of the program at the local level, a misconception which would result in the undercutting of a program which provides needed nourishment to millions of disadvantaged children. I will not support these cuts.

Furthermore, Mr. President, we are being asked to dramatically reduce our commitment to higher education. We all know that Federal aid to higher education is as good as any investment we can make to keep our leadership position in the world. The President's proposals, however, would place significant barriers between hundreds of thousands of our children and their opportunity for a higher education. Limiting federally subsidized student aid to $4,000 per year would cut deeply into the financial aid packages of a large percentage of students currently receiving aid, particularly low- and moderate-income students. In my State of New Jersey, the proposed changes in the student financial assistance programs would result in reductions in aid for nearly 50 percent of all students currently receiving assistance. This is hardly the time to slash Federal student aid by 27 percent.

Enough is enough. We cannot afford to cut back these valuable programs any further.

Mr. President, Thomas Jefferson fully appreciated the centrality of education to the future of our country and the democratic process itself. "If a nation expects to be ignorant and free," said Jefferson, "it expects what never was and what never will be." We would do well to continue to heed Jefferson's warning, which remains no less apt than it was 200 years ago. We must stand together and reject the President's proposal. That is the purpose of the resolution I am submitting today. I urge my colleagues to join me in that effort.

SENATE RESOLUTION 63—RELATING TO THE U.S. TRAVEL AND TOURISM ADMINISTRATION

Mr. INOUYE (for himself and Mr. HOLLINGS) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

S. RES. 63

Whereas the travel industry is the third largest retail or service industry in the United States, and such industry involves over $210 billion annually;

Whereas the travel industry is the second largest employer nationwide, and directly and indirectly employs over 6.8 million men and women, many of whom are among the least employable persons in the Nation's workforce;

Whereas unemployment in the United States was still at the intolerable rate of 7.2 percent for December 1984, and on that date unemployment exceeded 12 percent in seven hundred forty-eight counties of the Nation and was at a rate of 18.8 percent among youth, including 42.1 percent among black youth;

Whereas the United States Travel and Tourism Administration is the agency of the Federal Government responsible for promoting tourism to the United States;

Whereas the Department of Commerce has stated that the cost/benefit ratio for the United States Travel and Tourism Administration's promotional programs was $18.50 for every Federal dollar spent;

Whereas foreign visitors to the United States spent over $12 billion in 1984; and

Whereas the administration proposes to rescind approximately $4 million of the $12,000,000 appropriated in fiscal year 1985 for the United States Travel and Tourism Administration, and to prohibit the agency from opening three regional offices in Italy, the Netherlands, and Australia, which were mandated by the Act entitled "An Act making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce, Justice, and State, the Judiciary, and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, and for other purposes" (Public Law 98-411; 98 Stat. 1545): Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States urges the President to reconsider—

(1) the rescission of funds for the United States Travel and Tourism Administration and to make the full amount available for obligation in fiscal year 1985; and

(2) the prohibition against opening such regional offices.

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, last year Congress enacted and the President signed into law the Commerce, Justice, and State appropriations bill. Included in that $11.5 billion appropriation were $12 million for the programs of the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration, and a specific direction to that agency to open by January 1, 1985, three additional regional offices in the Netherlands, Italy, and Australia to promote tourism to the United States.

We believed that this relatively insignificant Federal expenditure and modest program expansion were more than justified for the following reasons:

The cost/benefit ratio for the agency's promotional programs was $18.50 for every Federal dollar spent.

In 1983, worldwide travel volume was 3.6 billion arrivals.

Some 21.7 million foreign visitors came to the United States that year; and in our domestic travel market there were 540 million household trips and 1 billion person trips.

Foreign visitors to the United States spent about $11.4 billion in 1983, and our domestic travel expenditures by U.S. residents amount to $198.5 billion. Total travel spending therefore amounted to $210 billion.

The travel industry is the third largest retail or service industry in the United States—food stores is the largest, $259 billion, and automobile dealers is second, $222 billion.

Tourism is the second largest private employer nationwide which directly and indirectly employs over 6,800,000 men and women, and most importantly, it provides gainful employment for those who find it difficult to find employment—such as our unskilled men and women—young and old.

In 1983, tourism expenditures generated $13.8 billion in Federal tax revenues; $8.7 billion in State tax revenues; and $2.8 billion in local tax revenues.

In other words, Mr. President, by any measure that activities and programs of this agency contribute significantly to the National economy and add substantial revenues to the Federal Treasury.

Notwithstanding the obvious national interest in continuing and expanding these activities, we will shortly be asked by the administration to rescind $4 million of the $12 million we appropriated for fiscal year 1985, and to agree to its decision not to open the three regional offices we mandated in Public Law 98-411.

In anticipation of the forthcoming rescission message, the U.S. Travel Service has already failed to comply with the January 1, opening date for the three new regional offices, and has not developed plans to obligate $4 million of the total we appropriated. Its ability to promote tourism this fiscal year has thus already been weakened.

Mr. President, this is not the first time, nor is it the first administration that has attempted to curtail and even eliminate the U.S. Travel and Tourism Association. Democratic and Republican administrations alike have tried, and each time Congress in a bipartisan effort has thwarted the effort.

A budget rescission, of course, does not go into effect unless the Congress affirmatively passes a bill to withdraw the appropriation. In this case I really do not expect that to happen, given Congress' past support for the program. Under the terms of the Budget Act, however, the funds are impounded for 45 days of continuous session of the Congress. It will therefore be late April or May at the earliest before the $4 million would again have to be made available, and the agency would have to open the three regional offices. Meanwhile, the national interest will suffer.

Mr. President, we should not lose this valuable time. Along with the junior Senator from South Carolina, I am submitting a resolution by which the Senate can call upon the President to reconsider the proposed rescission.●

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, once again an administration plans to dismantle the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration. This time it is a Republican administration, but the last time it was the Democrats. That effort is truly bipartisan, but so have been the congressional efforts which have defeated each and every attempt.

The administration also proposes to phase out the Travel Service during fiscal year 1986. Meanwhile, it is also asking Congress to rescind $4 million of the $12 million we appropriated for fiscal year 1985, and to agree to its decision not to open the three regional offices we mandated in Public Law 98-411.

Mr. President, this Senator takes a back seat to no one in the effort to reduce the Federal deficit. I will not repeat my freeze proposal that will reduce the deficit to $29 billion by fiscal year 1989, but that is based on a "freeze" and not a "termination" of necessary Federal programs. And I maintain that continuation of the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration at the levels Congress mandated makes sound economic sense because a healthy tourism industry will greatly benefit our economy. Let me recite a few statistics which I believe fully substantiate what I have said:

The cost/benefit ratio for the agency's promotional programs was $18.50 for every Federal dollar spent.

Foreign visitors to the United States spent about $11.4 billion in 1983, and our domestic travel expenditures by U.S. residents amounted to $198.5 billion. Total travel spending therefore amounted to $210 billion.

The travel industry is the third largest retail or service industry in the United States—food stores is the largest, $259 billion, and automobile dealers is second, $222 billion.

Tourism is the second largest private employer nationwide which directly and indirectly employs over 6,800,000 men and women, and most importantly, it provides gainful employment for those who find it difficult to find employment—such as our unskilled men and women—young and old.

In 1983, tourism expenditures generated $13.8 billion in Federal tax revenues; $8.7 billion in State tax revenues; and $2.8 billion in local tax revenues.

Those, of course, are national statistics. I would also like to cite some statistics for my own State of South Carolina.

Travel and tourism was the second largest employer in my State in 1982.

In 1982, travel and tourism generated: 68,400 jobs; 5.9 percent of all jobs in South Carolina; $480 million in payroll; and nearly $2.5 billion expenditures in the State.

Tourists spent over $6.7 million per day in South Carolina in 1982: $2,467 million total domestic traveler expenditures.

The sum of $218 million total tax revenues: $94 million Federal tax revenues; and $113 million State tax revenues. Tourism contributed more than $309,000 per day in South Carolina in State taxes in 1982. South Carolina received $24.04 in tourism generated States taxes for each dollar the State budgeted for tourism in 1982.

Mr. President, I do not believe the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration should tread water for 45 legislative days from the time Congress receives the administration's rescission message. I am therefore joining the senior Senator from Hawaii in submitting a resolution by which the Senate can call upon the President to reconsider the proposed rescission.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 64—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. SYMMS, from the Committee on Environment and Public Works, reported the following original resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 64

Resolved, That section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 is hereby waived with respect to the consideration of S. 391, the Interstate Highway Funding Act of 1985.

SEC. 2. This waiver is necessary so that multiyear highway legislation may be considered by the Senate. Highway authorizations are contract authority which when enacted create new spending authority. To consider this multiyear highway bill such a waiver is required by section 303(a).

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, the previously announced hearing of the Senate Budget Committee to consider the President's fiscal year 1986 budget submission on Thursday, February 7, 1985, at 10 a.m. in room 608 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building has been changed to 9:30 a.m. The Honorable Caspar Weinberger, Secretary of Defense, is scheduled to testify.

Mr. President, I would like to announce that the Senate Small Business Committee will hold a field hearing on February 15, 1985, in Seattle, WA, on U.S. Customs Service operations impact on exporters in the Puget Sound area. The hearing will begin at 1 p.m. in the Henry M. Jackson Federal Building. Senator SLADE GORTON will chair the hearing. For further information, please contact Bob Dotchin, of the committee staff at 224-5175.

Mr. President, I would like to announce that the Senate Small Business Committee will hold hearings on February 21 and 25, 1985, on a bill to authorize funding for the Small Business Administration for fiscal years 1986 through 1988. the hearing on February 21 will begin at 9:30 a.m. and on February 25, at 10 a.m. Both hearings will be held in room 428A of the Russell Senate Office Building. Senator WEICKER will chair the hearings. For further information, please contact Mike Haynes of the committee staff, at 224-8487.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Foreign Relations Committee be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Tuesday, February 5, at 2 p.m. for a briefing on American foreign policy, to be conducted by Richard Allen, former National Security Advisor to President Reagan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Tuesday, February 5, at 2 p.m., to receive a worldwide intelligence briefing from the Central Intelligence Agency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE FUTURE OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, on January 31, I began a series of hearings in the Foreign Relations Committee on the direction of American foreign policy—its goals and strategy, its policy objectives, and the means employed over time to achieve those objectives and defend those interests. In many respects, this is the first such comprehensive review of American foreign policy since the late Senator Henry Jackson convened hearings in 1961 entitled "Organizing for National Security."

During the course of the next month, the committee will ask a number of foreign policy experts to testify. The committee's lead-off witnesses were Secretary of State George Shultz, Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger, and former Secretary of State Cyrus Vance. I ask that the entirety of their opening statements be included in the RECORD.

The statements follow:

THE FUTURE OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY: NEW REALITIES AND NEW WAYS OF THINKING

(Testimony by Hon. George P. Shultz Before the Committee on Foreign Relations, January 31, 1985)

Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee, I am honored to lead off this important series of hearings on the future of American foreign policy. This is an auspicious moment: the beginning of a new Presidential term, of a new Congress, and of the term of a distinguished new Chairman. It is, for many reasons, a time of great promise and opportunity for the United States in world affairs.

Therefore, I commend the Chairman for focusing the attention of the Congress and the American people on the fundamental issues we will face—not just the day-to-day issues that make the news, but the underlying trends at work and the most important goals we pursue.

My presentation today is thus of a special kind. I would like to step back a bit and look at the present situation in perspective—the perspective of recent history, the perspective of the intellectual currents of our time, and the perspective of America's ideals and their relevance to the world's future.

THE CHANGING INTERNATIONAL SYSTEM

Soon after the dawn of the nuclear age, Albert Einstein observed that everything had changed except our ways of thinking. Even so dramatic a development as the nuclear revolution took a long time to be fully understood; how much longer has it usually taken to understand the implications of more subtle, intangible historical changes taking place around us.

Nineteen-forty-five, everyone knows, marked a major turning point. An international system that had lasted for more than a century had broken down under the weight of two world wars and a great depression. An international order centered on Europe and dominated by Europe was replaced in the early postwar period by a new arrangement—a world dominated by two new superpowers, torn by ideological conflict, and overshadowed by nuclear weapons that made a new world war potentially suicidal. At the same time, an integrated international economic system established by America's initiative—based on the dollar and on a strong commitment to the freest possible flow of trade and investment—replaced the unbridled economic nationalism that had helped undermine international peace between the wars.

But history never stops. The postwar order, too, evolved and changed its shape. The breakup of colonial empires brought scores of new states onto the world stage. The so-called Third World became the scene of a growing number of local and regional conflicts. America, after Vietnam, retreated for a time from its active role of leadership. Europe, China, and Japan came into their own again as important economic and political actors; the energy crisis dramatized both the diffusion of economic power and the vulnerability of the postwar economic system. The United States and the Soviet Union attempted a political dialogue to stabilize relations and control nuclear arms; then the dialogue broke down under the weight of the Soviet military buildup and geopolitical offensive.

Today, the cycle is turning again. Change is constant. America has recovered its strength and self-confidence, Power continues to be dispersed and the structure of political relations more complex, even as the interdependence of states increases. And as we head toward the 21st century, is a stable new pattern of international relations emerging? Einstein's observation takes on new relevance: Our ways of thinking must adapt to new realities; we must grasp the new trends and understand their implications.

But we are not just observers; we are participants and we are engaged. America is again in a position to have a major influence over the trend of events—and America's traditional goals and values have not changed. Our duty must be to help shape the evolving trends in accordance with our ideals and interests; to help build a new structure of international stability that will ensure peace, prosperity, and freedom for coming generations. This is the real challenge of our foreign policy over the coming years.

What are the forces of change? And what are the possible elements of a new and more acute international system?

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SUPERPOWERS

Relations between the superpowers remain crucial, even though their political predominance is less than it was a few decades ago. Over 50 years' experience of US-Soviet relations has given us by now a mature understanding of what is possible and what is not possible in this relationship. Yet conditions are evolving and the problem remains a conceptual challenge.

True friendship and cooperation will remain out of reach so long as the Soviet system is driven by ideology and national ambition to seek to aggrandize its power and undermine the interests of the democracies.

We must resist this Soviet power drive vigorously if there is to be any hope for lasting stability. At the same time, in the thermonuclear age the common interest in survival gives both sides an incentive to moderate the rivalry and to seek, in particular, ways to control nuclear weapons and reduce the risks of war.[1] We cannot know whether such a steady Western policy will, over time, lead to a mellowing of the Soviet system. Perhaps not. But the West has the same responsibility in either case: to resist Soviet encroachments firmly while holding the door open to more constructive possibilities.

After the failure of their political campaign to divide NATO, their propaganda to thwart deployment of intermediate-range nuclear missiles in Europe, and their boycott of talks, the Soviets have now returned to the arms control dialogue. We welcome this. My meeting in Geneva with Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko was a constructive beginning of what the United States hopes will be a fruitful negotiation.

My able interlocutor Andrei Gromyko is, in a sense, the living embodiment of some of the Soviet Union's great advantages—continuity, patience, the ability to fashion a long-term strategy and stick to it. When the Soviets shift tactics, it is more often than not an adjustment to objective conditions without basic diversion from their long-term aims.

The democracies, in contrast, have long had difficulty maintaining the same consistency, coherence, discipline, and sense of strategy. Free societies are often impatient. Western attitudes have fluctuated between extremes of gloom and pessimism on the one hand, and susceptibility to a Soviet smile on the other. Our ways of thinking have tended too often to focus either on increasing our strength or on pursuing negotiations; we have found it hard to do both simultaneously—which is clearly the most sensible course and probably the only way we can sustain either our defense programs or our ability to negotiate.

It is vital, for example, to carry through with the modernization of our strategic forces—in particular the MX—to avoid undercutting our negotiators just as they begin the quest for real reductions in nuclear arms. The Soviets have little incentive to negotiate seriously for reductions to lower, equal levels if we hand them on a silver platter their long-cherished goal of unilateral American reductions. Likewise, as we pursue such agreements, we are obliged to bear in mind the Soviets' record of violating previous accords and to insist on effective verification provisions in any new agreements.

In the last four years, the underlying conditions that affect US-Soviet relations have changed dramatically. A decade or so ago, when the United States was beset by economic difficulties, neglecting its defenses, and hesitant about its role of leadership, the Soviets exploited these conditions. They continued their relentless military buildup; they and their clients moved more boldly in the geopolitical arena, intervening in such places as Angola, Cambodia, Ethiopia, and Afghanistan, believing that the West was incapable of resisting. They had reason for confidence that what they call the global "correlation of forces" was shifting in their favor.

Today, the West is more united than ever before. The United States is restoring its military strength and economic vigor and had regained its self-assurance; we have a President with a fresh mandate from the people for an active role of leadership. The Soviets, in contrast, face profound structural economic difficulties, a continuing succession problem, and restless allies; its diplomacy and its clients are on the defensive in many parts of the world. We have reason to be confident that the "correlation of forces" is shifting back in our favor.

Nevertheless, history won't do our work for us. The Soviets can be counted upon periodically to do something, somewhere, that is abhorrent or inimical to our interests.

The question is how the West can respond in a way that could help discipline Soviet international behavior but does not leave our own strategy vulnerable to periodic disruption by such external shocks. We must never let ourselves be so wedded to improving relations with the Soviets that we turn a blind eye to actions that undermine the very foundation of stable relations; symbolic responses to outrageous Soviet behavior have their place, and so do penalties and sanctions. At the same time, experience shows we cannot deter or undo Soviet geopolitical encroachments except by helping, in one way or another, those resisting directly on the ground. And many negotiations and endeavors we undertake with the Soviets serve mutual interests—indeed, they all should.

This leaves us with tough choices. Whether important negotiations ought to be interrupted after some Soviet outrage will always be a complex calculation. When the Soviets shot down the Korean Air Lines passenger plane in 1983, President Reagan made sure the world knew the full unvarnished truth about the atrocity; nevertheless, he also sent our arms control negotiators back to Geneva because he believed that a reduction in nuclear weapons was a critical priority.

In short, our "way of thinking" must seek a sustainable strategy geared to American goals and interests, in the light of Soviet behavior but not just a reaction to it.

Such a strategy requires a continuing willingness to solve problems through negotiation where this serves our interests (and presumably mutual interests). Our leverage will come from creating objective realities that will give the Soviets a growing stake in better relations with us across the board: by modernizing our defenses, assisting our friends, and confronting Soviet challenges. We must learn to pursue a strategy geared to long-term thinking and based on both negotiation and strength simultaneously, if we are to build a stable US-Soviet relationship for the next century.[2]

The intellectual challenge of a new era faces us in a related dimension, namely arms control. The continuous revolution in technology means that the strategic balance—and the requirements of deterrence—are never static. Unfortunately, conventional ways of thinking about many of these questions continue to lag behind reality.

For decades, standard strategic doctrine in the West has ultimately relied on the balance of terror—the confrontation of offensive arsenals by which the two sides threaten each other with mass extermination.

Certainly deterrence has worked under these conditions; nevertheless, for political, strategic, and even moral reasons, we should seek to do better than the proposition that our defense strategy must rely on offensive threats and must leave our people unprotected against attack. The Soviets, for their part, have always attached enormous importance to strategic defense, including not only air defense and civil defense but a deployed and modernized anti-ballistic missile system around Moscow—and intensive research into new defensive technologies.

The pace of technological advance now opens possibilities for new ways of strategic thinking—never an easy process. The vehemence of some of the criticism of the President's Strategic Defense Initiative seems to come less from the argument over technical feasibility—which future research will answer one way or another in an objective manner—than from the passionate defense of orthodox doctrine in the face of changing strategic realities. We are proceeding with SDI research because we see a positive, and indeed revolutionary potential: Defensive measures may become available that could render obsolete the threat of an offensive first strike. A new strategic equilibrium based on defensive technologies and sharply reduced offensive deployments is likely to be the most stable and secure arrangement of all.

Our concept can be described as follows: During the next ten years, the U.S. objective is a radical reduction in the power of existing and planned offensive nuclear arms, as well as the stabilization of the relationship between offensive and defensive nuclear arms, whether on earth or in space. We are even now looking forward to a period of transition to a more stable world, with greatly reduced levels of nuclear arms and an enhanced ability to deter war based upon an increasing contribution of non-nuclear defenses against offensive nuclear arms. This period of transition could lead to the eventual elimination of all nuclear arms, both offensive and defensive. A world free of nuclear arms is an ultimate objective to which we, the Soviet Union, and all other nations can agree.

THE GROWING UNITY AND STRENGTH OF FRIENDS AND ALLIES

As the political dominance of the superpowers began to erode in the last few decades, some saw a five-power world emerging—with the United States, Soviet Union, Western Europe, China, and Japan as the major players. After the energy crisis of the early 1970s, others emphasized the increasing importance of the North-South relationship. The fact is, none of these concepts adequately describes the evolving pattern of world politics.

In my view, the most striking trend is something else: the growing dynamism, cohesion, and cooperation of like-minded nations that share an important set of positive goals.

Equilibrium is not enough. American foreign policy is driven by positive goals—peace, democracy, liberty, and human rights; racial justice; economic and social progress; the strengthening of cooperation and the rule of law. These are not Soviet goals. Yet they are at the core of any durable international system, because they are the goals that inspire peoples and nations around the world.[3]

The new spirit and unity of peoples that share these goals is a new trend we can see in many regions of the world and in many dimensions of foreign policy.

We see a new spirit of collaboration and friendship in our ties with our immediate neighbors Canada and Mexico—ties whose importance is self-evident and which are a priority interest of the President.

In the Atlantic community, our time is marked by a new degree of political harmony and intimate collaboration among the Western allies.

Just as striking, Japan too has emerged as a partner on key political and security issues. There is a new awareness, for example, of the importance of strengthening conventional defenses, as a way of bolstering Europe's security while reducing NATO's reliance on nuclear weapons. A strong Western deterrence posture is the most solid basis for engaging the East in constructive negotiations. Under Lord Carrington's wise leadership, NATO is taking steps for the short run to improve its readiness and infrastructure. For the longer run, the Alliance is addressing other critical deficiencies, including the fundamental challenge of improving the efficiency of allied defense procurement.

Amid all the changes in the world, the security and well-being of Western Europe continue to be a vital interest of the United States. We have always supported Western European unity, knowing that a strong Europe, while it would be a competitor in some ways, was in the overall interest of the free world. We wish the European Community well; we encourage our European friends to make further progress in developing a true European-wide market and in breaking down structural rigidities that impede both economic expansion and effective economic cooperation with us.

We see also, in Europe, new and creative thinking about the continuing pursuit of political unity, and about strengthening Western European cooperation in the defense field.

We support both these goals. The West can only benefit from a major European role in world affairs. And the peoples of Western Europe should see defense as an endeavor they undertake for their own future, not as a favor to the United States. With statesmanship and a spirit of collaboration on both sides of the Atlantic, this evolution will strengthen the common defense and heighten the sense of common political purpose among the democracies.

As we think about Europe's evolution, we cannot forget Eastern Europe. Since the days of the Marshall Plan, when the West invited the East to join, we have always wanted the success of Western Europe to be a beacon to all of Europe. The present political division of the continent is wholly artificial; it exists only because it has been imposed by brute Soviet power; the United States has never recognized it as legitimate or permanent. Behind this cruel barrier lie political repression and economic stagnation. In certain countries, there are efforts at liberalization. But all the peoples of Eastern Europe are capable of something better, deserve something better, and yearn for something better. We have witnessed in recent years the powerful aspiration for free trade unions, for economic reform, for political and religious freedom, for true peace and security, for human rights as promised by the Helsinki accords.[4]

We hope to see the day when the Soviet Union learns to think anew of its own security in terms compatible with the freedom, security, and independence of its neighbors.

In East Asia and the Pacific, another new reality is changing our thinking about the world. The economic dynamism of this region is taking on increasing importance, not only as a factor in America's foreign trade but as an economic model for the developing world and as a unique and attractive vision of the future. We see the countries of free Asia growing at seven percent a year over the past decade; for the past five years, our trade with East Asia and the Pacific has been greater than our trade with any other region and is expanding at an accelerating rate. ASEAN has become one of the world's most impressive examples of economic development and regional political cooperation. The Republic of Korea is a spectacular economic success story. Japan is playing a larger role—responsibly, positively, and cooperatively—commensurate with its growing strength. Experience is proving that economic openness is the formula for prosperity.

Pragmatism is now the watchword in the People's Republic of China, where the hopes for economic modernization have been invested—wisely—in a bold program of reform. China's long march to market is a truly historic event—a great nation throwing off outmoded economic doctrines and liberating the energies of a billion talented people. We wish China well in this exciting endeavor.

There are, of course, problems that pose dangers to this bright economic future: the Soviet military buildup in the region; aggression by the Soviet Union and its clients in Afghanistan and Cambodia; unresolved tensions on the Korean peninsula; internal problems in various countries. East Asia has a rich heritage of civilization—and also a turbulent history of bitter conflict. The tragedy that two of Asia's great ancient monuments—Angkor Wat and Borobudur—have suffered damage from modern violence is both a paradox and a warning.

The United States is conscious of its responsibility to contribute, in its way, to security and stability in East Asia and the Pacific. Our diplomacy seeks peaceful solutions to Asia's problems so that the fullest potential of its promise can be realized. We welcome in particular the role of ASEAN, including the front-line state of Thailand, which is working effectively to curb Vietnamese expansionism and aggression and to achieve a just settlement of the Cambodian conflict.

Overall, we are enormously encouraged by the new trend we see toward wider collaboration among many Asian nations with an extraordinary diversity of cultures, races, and political systems. A sense of Pacific community is emerging. There is an expanding practice of regional consultation, and a developing sense of common interest in regional security.

In this sense, a decade after Vietnam, the United States has more than restored its position in Asia. We can be proud of the vitality of our alliances, friendships, and productive ties in this promising region. If nations act with wisdom and statesmanship, we may well be at the threshold of a new era in international relations in the Pacific Basin.[5]

In Latin America, another kind of trend is apparent—the steady advance of democracy. Democracy is hardly a new idea, but this new development is revising some earlier assumptions in some quarters about the world's political future. A few years back, pessimists maintained that the industrial democracies were doomed to permanent minority status in the world community. Today, there is mounting evidence that the ideal of liberty is alive and well. In the Western hemisphere, almost 95 percent of the population of Latin America and the Caribbean today live under governments that are either democratic or clearly on the road to democracy—in contrast to only one-third in 1979. Over the last five years, popularly elected leaders have replaced military rulers or dictators in Argentina, Bolivia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Honduras, Panama, Peru, and Grenada.

Brazil and Uruguay will inaugurate new civilian presidents in March. Guatemala is in transition to democracy. After a long twilight of dictatorship, the trend toward free elections and popular sovereignty in this hemisphere is something to cheer about.[6]

The United States has always been a champion of democracy. Democratic institutions are the best guarantor of human rights, and also the best long-term guarantor of stability. The National Endowment for Democracy, with bipartisan support, is one reflection of this American commitment. On every continent, we see a trend toward democracy or else a yearning for democracy; both are vivid demonstrations that the idea of liberty is far from a culture-bond aspiration or monoply of the industralized West.

In fact, after years of guerrilla insurgencies led by Communists against pro-Western governments, we now see dramatic and heartening examples of popular insuregencies against Communist regimes.

Today—in a variety of different circumstances—in Nicaragua, in Afghanistan, in Cambodia, in Ethiopia and elsewhere in Africa—Marxist-Leninist rulers have found that the aspiration for representative government is not so easy to suppress. Americans have a long and honorable tradition of supporting the struggle of other peoples for freedom, democracy, independence, and liberation from tyranny. In the 19th century we supported Simon Bolivar, Polish patriots, and others seeking freedom—reciprocating, in a way, the aid given to us in our own revolution by other nations like France.

As the President put it a week ago, "[W]e, who are committed to free government and democratic institutions, must maintain a sense of fraternity between ourselves and other freedom-loving peoples." This is a proud heritage and a moral responsibility—and it poses some practical questions that we must face up to early in the 99th Congress.

The future of democracy is precisely what is at stake in Central America. United States policy is to promote democracy, reform, and human rights; to support economic development; to help provide a security shield against those who seek to spread tyranny by force; and to support dialogue and negotiation both within and among the countries of the region. Acting directly and through Cuba, the Soviet Union is abetting the establishment of a new Communist dictator ship in Nicaragua.

We are backing democratic governments and democratic political forces throughout Central America against extremists of both the left and the right. If we abandon those seeking democracy, the extremists will gain and the forces of moderation and decency will be the victims. This is why the Administration has worked so hard, and will continue to work hard, for effective negotiations, for economic and security assistance, and for the bipartisan plan that emerged from the Kissinger Commission. If the forces of dictatorship continue to feel free to aid and abet insurgencies in the name of "proletarian internationalism," it would be absurd if the democracies felt inhibited about promoting the cause of democracy, even by collective self-defense against such actions. Our nation's vital interests and moral responsibility require us to stand by our friends in their struggle for freedom.[7]

THE DYNAMIC OF CHANGE

The process of change is inexorable. In southern Africa we have a role to play in working for democratic change in South Africa.

We are also key to efforts to help create a climate of regional security that will enable and encourage countries to get on with the priority of building decent and prosperous societies. In short, United States policy must pursue the dual objectives of racial justice and regional security. These two goals are not in conflict; they reinforce each other. But achieving them requires responsible, prudent, and dedicated diplomacy.

These twin challenges call for serious analysis and sober thinking, not emotional responses. We have already accomplished much, but our influence is not infinite. Today there is less cross-border violence in southern Africa than at any time in more than a decade. Progress is being made toward a Namibia settlement. We have strengthened ties with Mozambique and other regional states. And South Africa itself has developed cooperative relations with many of its neighbors.

President Reagan has made clear that we regard South African apartheid as repugnant. He spoke loud and clear on December 10 when he said: "We call upon the Government of South Africa to reach out to its black majority by ending the forced removal of blacks from their communities, and the detention without trial and lengthy imprisonment of black leaders. . . .

We ask that the constructive changes of recent years be broadened to address the aspirations of all South Africans. . . . We urge both the government and the people of South Africa to move toward a more just society."

Within South Africa, a dynamic of change is already at work: More positive change is occurring now than in the 1970s or '60s or '50s. The positive influence of our relationship—our diplomacy, our companies, our assistance programs for black South Africans—is helping to build the basis for further change. Apartheid must go. But the only course consistent with American values is to engage ourselves as a force for constructive, peaceful change while there is still a chance. It cannot be our choice to cheer on, from the sidelines, the forces of polarization that could erupt in a race war; it is not our job to exacerbate hardship, which could lead to the same result.

Another region of change is the Middle East. Recent events have reminded us that the Arab-Israeli conflict is far from the only source of tension in that part of the world. There are other deep-seated national, ethnic, and religious conflicts like the Iran-Iraq war; there are diverse sources of radical extremism ranging from Marxist-Leninist ideology, to Islamic fundamentalism, to Qadhafi's bizarre personal brand of fanaticism; the Soviets seek to reinforce rejectionist elements and to exploit regional tensions for their own advantage.

The United States will continue its efforts to promote peaceful solutions in this vital area. This mediation is, of course, a traditional American role, but new conditions always call for new ways of thinking about how to pursue it. We are committed to the support of diplomatic efforts to end the conflicts in the Gulf, in Lebanon, and in the Sahara. We are committed to the President's September 1 initiative as the most promising route to a solution of the Palestinian problem. We will be intensively engaged this year in consultations with our Arab and Israeli friends to explore opportunities for progress.[8]

In the global economy, an important shift of another kind is taking place—an intellectual shift, reflecting some lessons from experience. Lord Keynes' point about practical men being in thrall to some defunct economist may be less true now than in the past. Or perhaps the views first expressed by Adam Smith over two centuries ago on the creation of the "wealth of nations" are once again gaining practical prominence. At any rate, reality is intruding on some long-held notions about economic policy.

In both industrialized and developing countries, the economic difficulties of recent years are reminding us of some old truths about the real sources of economic progress. Some of us never forgot those truths. But recent experience has fueled a broad and long-overdue skepticism about statist solutions, central planning, and government direction.

This intellectual shift is partly the product of the extraordinary vigor of the American recovery. The United States has revised its tax system to provide real incentives to work, to save, to invest, to take risks, to be efficient. We have reduced government regulation, intervention, and control. We have opened opportunities for freer competition in transportation, finance, communication, manufacturing, and distribution. Last year's real growth in GNP was the sharpest increase since 1951; inflation was the lowest since 1967. The overall result has been the extraordinary creation of over seven million new jobs in two years.

Success inspires emulation. Not only in East Asia, as I noted, but on every continent—Europe, Latin America, Africa, and elsewhere in Asia—we see movement to decentralize, to deregulate, to denationalize, to reduce rigidity, and to enlarge the scope for individual producers and consumers to cooperate freely through markets.

In Africa, for example: If there is to be a long-term solution to the problem of hunger, it will have to come not just from relief efforts but from training, productive investment, and liberalizing reforms in agriculture; our aid policy is encouraging the efforts of African countries to move further in this direction.[9]

A worldwide revolution in economic thought and economic policy is underway. And it is coming just in time, because it coincides with yet another revolution—a revolution in the technological base of the global economy. This is what Walter Wriston has called "the onrushing age of information technology"—the combination of microchip computers, advanced telecommunications, and continuing innovation that is transforming almost every aspect of human endeavor.

The implications of this revolution are not only economic. First of all, the very existence of these new technologies is yet another testimony to the crucial importance of entrepreneurship—and government policies that give free rein to entrepreneurship—as the wellspring of technological creativity and economic growth.

The closed societies of the East are likely to fall far behind in these areas—and Western societies that maintain too many restrictions on economic activity run the same risk. Second, any government that resorts to heavy-handed measures to control or regulate or tax the flow of electronic information will find itself stifling the growth of the world economy as well as its own progress. This is one of the reasons why the United States is pressing for a new round of trade negotiations in these service fields of data processing and transfer of information.

Third, the advance of technology in this dimension is bound to challenge many cherished notions of sovereignty. But here too the West has the advantage, because the free flow of information is inherently compatible with our political system and values. The Communist states, in contrast, fear this information revolution perhaps even more than they fear Western military strength. If knowledge is power, then the communications revolution threatens to undermine their most important monopoly—their effort to stifle their people's information, thought, and independence of judgment. We all remember the power of the Ayatollah's message disseminated on tape cassettes in Iran; what could have a more profound impact in the Soviet bloc than similar cassettes, outside radio broadcasting, direct broadcast satellites, personal computers, or xerox machines?

Totalitarian societies face a dilemma: Either they try to stifle these technologies and thereby fall further behind in the new industrial revolution, or elese they permit these technologies and see their totalitarian control inevitably eroded. In fact, they do not have a choice, because they will never be able entirely to block the tide of technological advance however hard they try.

The march of technology also compels us to continue our efforts to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. The United States has long been the leader of an international effort to establish a regime of institutional arrangements, legal commitments, and technological safeguards to control the proliferation of nuclear weapons capabilities. This program has, in fact, had considerable success, in that the number of states that have acquired the means to produce nuclear explosives is far lower than doomsayers predicted 20 years ago. At the same time, the potential dangers of nuclear weapons proliferation remain as serious and menacing to international stability as has long been predicted.

The Reagan Administration will pursue this essential endeavor with a realistic appreciation of its complexities. Our thinking on this issue takes account of the growing international reliance on peaceful nuclear energy, the security concerns that give rise to the incentive to seek nuclear weapons, and the need for broad multilateral collaboration among nuclear suppliers if a non-proliferation regime is to be effective. We have made progress in restoring a relationship of confidence and a reputation for reliability with our nuclear trading partners. We have had fruitful talks with the Soviet Union on this subject; we have worked to promote comprehensive safeguards and stricter export controls.[10]

NEW CHALLENGES TO OUR WAYS OF THINKING

Mr. Chairman, these broad trends I have described are mostly positive trends, but not all. We see social dislocation arising from economic change; we see urban alienation, political turbulence, and the many potential sources and forms of disorder I have mentioned. The changes in the international system will follow the positive trends only if we—the United States and the free world—meet our responsibility to defend our interests and seek to shape events in accordance with our own ideals and goals.

In at least one respect, the modern world—with its spreading technology and prosperity and democratic aspirations—is ironically becoming also more and more vulnerable. I am thinking, of course, about terrorism. Even as the world becomes more secure from the danger of major war, paradoxically the democratic world now faces an increasing threat from this new form of warfare.

Terrorism these days is becoming less an isolated phenomenon of local fanatics, and increasingly part of a new international strategy resorted to by the enemies of freedom. It is a vicious weapons used deliberately against democracies; against the interests, policies, and friends of the democracies; and against completely innocent people. There are disturbing links, as well, to international drug trafficking. Terrorism is a problem that, more than many others, is forcing us into new ways of thinking about how to safeguard our future. During the year ahead we must be prepared for serious terrorist threats in Western Europe, in the Middle East, and in Latin America, much of it supported by or encouraged by a handful of ruthless governments.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, I have been speaking out frequently on this subject, to stimulate public consideration and discussion of the complex issues involved.[11]

A counter-strategy for combatting terrorism, in my view, must encompass many things:

We and our allies must work still harder to improve security, share information, coordinate police efforts, and collaborate in other ways to defeat international terrorism. Much has been done in the past year, but much more remains to be done.

We in this country must think hard about the moral stakes involved. If we truly believe in our democratic values and our way of life, we must be willing to defend them. Passive measures are unlikely to suffice; means of more active defense and deterrence must be considered and given the necessary political support.

Finally, while working tirelessly to deny terrorists their opportunities and their means, we can—and must—be absolutely firm in denying them their goals. They seek to blackmail us into changing our foreign policies or to drive us out of countries and regions where we have important interests. This we cannot permit; we cannot yield position or abandon friends or responsibilities under this kind of pressure. If we allow terrorists even one such victory, we embolden them further; we demoralize all who rely on us, and we make the world an even more dangerous place.

There is, of course, a broader issue here, which I have also been discussing in several public statements. This is the basic question of the use of American power in the defense of our interests and the relevance of our power as the backstop to our diplomacy. It is relfected, for example, in what are often called "gray-area challenges"—namely, the kind of regional or local conflicts and crises that are likely to persist in a turbulent world, below the threshold of major war but nonetheless affecting important Western interests. Most of the major conflicts since 1945, indeed, have originated in such conflicts in the developing world. The end of the colonial order has not brought universal peace and justice; much of the developing world is torn by the continuing struggle between the forces of moderation and the forces of radicalism—a struggle actively exploited and exacerbated by the Soviet Union.

It is absurd to think that America can walk away from such challenges. This is a world of great potential instability and many potential dangers. We live, as is commonly said, on a shrinking planet and in a world of increasing interdependence. We have an important stake in the health of the world economy and in the overall conditions of global security; the freedom and safety of our fellow human beings will always impinge on our moral consciousness. Not all these challenges threaten vital interests, but at the same time an accumulation of successful challenges can add up to a major adverse change in the geopolitical balance.

We must be wise and prudent in deciding how and where to use our power. Economic and security assistance to allies and friends is clearly the preferred course—and is of crucial importance to our foreign policy; the direct American use of force must always be a last resort. The United States will always seek political solutions to problems—but such solutions will never succeed unless aggression is resisted and diplomacy is backed by strength. We are reasonably well prepared to deter all-out Soviet nuclear aggression—provided we continue with our strategic modernization—but we must be sure we are as well prepared, physically and psychologically, for this intermediate range of challenges.[12]

PEACE, PROGRESS, AND FREEDOM

Mr. Chairman, I have touched on a wide variety of topics, but two very important, and very basic, conclusions can be drawn from them.

First, the agenda for the immediate future seems to me to be an agenda on which the American people are essentially united. These are goals that are widely shared and tasks that are likely to reinforce another important trend: namely, the reemergence of a national consensus on the main elements of our foreign policy.[13]

This indeed, may be the most important positive trend of all, because so many of our difficulties in recent decades have been very much the product of our own domestic divisions. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that our two parties and our two branches of government will find ways to cooperate in this spirit, which would enormously strengthen our country in the face of the new opportunities and challenges I have described.

Second, Mr. Chairman, all the diverse topics I have touched upon are, in the end, closely interrelated. President Reagan made this point in his speech to the United Nations last September.[14] The United States seeks peace and security; we seek economic progress; we seek to promote freedom, democracy, and human rights. The conventional way of thinking is to treat these as discrete categories of activity. In fact, as we have seen, it is now more and more widely recognized that there is a truly profound connection among them. And this has important implications for the future.

It is no accident, for example, that America's closest and most lasting international relationships are its alliances with its fellow democracies.

These ties with the Atlantic Community, Japan, and other democratic friends have an enduring quality precisely because they rest on a moral base, not only a base of strategic interest. When George Washington advised his countrymen to steer clear of permanent alliances, his attitude was colored by the fact that there were hardly any other fellow democracies in those days. We were among the first, and we had good reason to be wary of entanglements with countries that did not share our democratic principles. In any case, we now define our strategic interests in terms that embrace the safety and well-being of the democratic world.

Similarly, as I have already discussed, it is more and more understood that economic progress is related to a political environment of openness and freedom. It used to be thought in some quarters that socialism was the appropriate model for developing countries because central planning was better able to mobilize and allocate resources in conditions of scarcity. The historical experience of Western Europe and North America, which industrialized in an era of limited government, was not thought to be relevant. Yet the more recent experience of the Third World shows that a dominant government role in developing economies has done more to stifle the natural forces of production and productivity and to distort the efficient allocation of resources.

The real engine of growth, in developing as well as industrialized countries, turns out to be the natural dynamism of societies that minimize central planning, open themselves to trade with the world, and give free rein to the talents and efforts and risk-taking and investment decisions of individuals.

Finally, there is almost certainly also a relationship between economic progress, freedom, and world peace. Andrei Sakharoc has written: "I am convinced that international trust, mutual understanding, disarmament, and international security are inconceivable without an open society with freedom of information, freedom of conscience, the right to publish, and the right to travel and choose the country in which one wishes to live. I am also convinced that freedom of conscience, together with other civic rights, provides both the basis for scientific progress and a guarantee against its misuse to harm mankind."

The implication of all this is profound: It is that the Western values of liberty and democracy, which some have been quick to write off as culture-bound or irrelevant or passe, are not to be so easily dismissed. Their obituary is premature. These values are the source of our strength, economic as well as moral, and they turn out to be more central to the world's future than many may have realized.

After more than a century of fashionable Marxist mythology about economic determinism and the "crisis of capitalism," the key to human progress turns out to be those very Western concepts of political and economic freedom that Marxists claimed were obsolete. They were wrong. Today—the supreme irony—it is the Communist system that looks bankrupt, morally as well as economically. The West is resilient and resurgent.

And so, in the end, the most important new way of thinking that is called for in this decade is our way of thinking about ourselves. Civilizations thrive when they believe in themselves; they decline when they lose this faith. All civilizations confront massive problems—but a society is more likely to master its challenges, rather than be overwhelmed by them, if it retains this bedrock self-confidence that its values are worth defending. This is the essence of the Reagan revolution and of the leadership the President has sought to provide in America.

The West has been through a difficult period in the last decade or more. But now we see a new turn. The next phase of the industrial revolution—like all previous phases—comes from the democratic world, where innovation and creativity are allowed to spring from the unfettered human spirit. By working together, we can spread the benefit of the technological revolution to all.

And on every continent—from Nicaragua to Cambodia, from Poland to South Africa to Afghanistan—we see that the yearning for freedom is the most powerful political force all across the planet.

So, as we head toward the 21st century, it is time for the democracies to celebrate their system, their beliefs, and their success. We face challenges, but we are well poised to master them. Opinions are being revised about which system is the wave of the future. The free nations, if they maintain their unity and their faith in themselves, have the advantage—economically, technologically, morally.

History is on freedom's side.

STATEMENT OF SECRETARY CASPAR W. WEINBERGER, TO THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE, JANUARY 31, 1985

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee. I appreciate the opportunity to meet with you today to discuss U.S. national security principles and goals. Let me first commend this committee for convening these hearings to strengthen the consensus in American foreign policy. In any nation founded on the consent of the governed, the backing of an informed people is essential to the long-term success of our foreign affairs. It is also necessary to keep the public support necessary for the investments we must make to secure strong defenses. So, by working to forge a greater national consensus, your committee helps bolster the political commitment which, in combination with our military capabilities, forms the basis for our national strength.

The strongest foundation on which to build a consensus on foreign policy is the American character—our values, our traits, our spirit. As you review the Reagan administration's foreign policy, I believe you will find that it does indeed reflect the best of our American character, in particular our continuing quest for peace with freedom.

America's national security strategy and defense policies support our overall foreign policy by safeguarding our Nation and preserving our vital interest. Our basic national interests have remained constant during the post-war period. Broadly speaking, we seek to survive as a nation, to be free to pursue our way of life, to preserve and strengthen the democratic world.

CHALLENGES TO AMERICA'S INTERESTS

If our national interests have remained unchanged, so too has the fundamental challenge to these interests posed by the aims and ambitions of the Soviet Union, and the military power that gives them force.

People whose business is news naturally enjoy speculating about how dramatically our relationship with the Soviet Union may be changing at any given time. They like to take its temperature on a daily basis and pronounce chills or thaws, new eras of cold war or detente.

But this committee has deliberately and properly chosen to look away from today's headlines to the underlying principles—and enduring dilemmas—of American foreign policy. As you look, I think you will see that the most important elements of our relations with the Soviet Union have been constant, or changed very slowly, in the post-war years.

Soviet repression has become more sophisticated, but life has not, as Stalin once promised, become "better and gayer" for the people of the Soviet Union. The ambition of Soviet leaders to extend the sway of Marxism-Leninism, if lacking in true ideological fervor, is nevertheless today supported by tremendous military power. The 1977 Brezhnev constitution reiterates that it is Soviet Russia's aim, indeed duty, to spread the Communist system to all the countries of the world. And this long-held doctrine of Soviet domination is backed up by the full force of the Red Army. The people of Czechoslovakia, Angola, Cambodia, Afghanistan, and Poland can bear eloquent witness to the Soviets' willingness to use force directly or indirectly through proxies, and use it mercilessly.

President Reagan has not shrunk from stating the truth about these harsh realities of Soviet behavior. At the same time he has actively sought out new opportunities for negotiation and cooperation, and laid the groundwork for a realistic, long-term, peaceful relationship with the Soviet Union. He has demonstrated that we can be businesslike without being morally blind, vigilant without being belligerent—and that we can negotiate without surrendering our principles or our interests.

Above all, President Reagan has refused to shut his eyes to the fruits of an ambitious and sustained Soviet program of military investment. Coupled with U.S. restraint during the 1970's, this expanding military power enabled Moscow to shift critical components of the overall global military balance in its favor. While building on their superiority in numbers, the Soviets are also dramatically improving the quality of their military systems and closing the West's technological edge. We are in the twelfth year of debate over the MX missile, and while we debate, the Soviets deploy. They continue to test and field new and more accurate missiles and to improve all their strategic nuclear forces. And since the mid-70's, the Soviets have widened their conventional advantage in nearly every force category by producing major weapons at rates much greater than those of the United States and our NATO allies combined.

To exert its military power around the world, the Soviet Union is also expanding the geographic reach of its forces. We have seen growth in Soviet airlift, the emergence of a strong blue-water navy, the development of overseas bases, and the opportunistic expansion of Soviet presence and influence worldwide. Today the Soviets have bases and ports near the world's major trade routes and energy resources, threatening U.S. interests as well as those of our friends and allies.

Further complicating America's security challenge is the increased political turmoil and the rise in international terrorism in many regions of the world. The Soviets have demonstrated their ability and willingness to exploit that turmoil when it advances their goals.

A STRATEGY TO PROTECT AMERICA'S INTERESTS

While the Soviets have an offensive-oriented strategy, the United States has a defensive strategy that reflects our values as a nation. Let us pause here, and think about the tremendous burden this puts on American strategy. As Secretary of Defense I am often asked to explain U.S. strategy. Not infrequently, it turns out that I am really being asked for an explicit account of just where, when, and how we would use our military power under any and all conceivable circumstances. And if the questioner does not hear exactly what he wants to hear, he will report that our strategy is "incoherent."

But "coherent" plans for first uses of military forces are the luxury of aggressors. It is the fate of defenders that we cannot choose the time, place, and method of attack. It is the responsibility of defenders to be prepared to meet a wide range of contingencies from terrorism to global conflict. Our position as a defensive nation necessarily means that we must live with an element of uncertainty in our military strategy.

Since we do not seek territorial gains from the use of military power, we maintain our forces in a reactive posture. We will use our military forces only in response to clear threats to our security and interests. And when those threats can come from many quarters, as is the case with the Soviets' widely dispersed forces and strength, our defensive forces must be strong and capable of responding in more than one area, perhaps, simultaneously. Only if we have this strength will we be able to deter attack from a worldwide military powers as strong as the U.S.S.R. Moreover, we seek to reduce the causes of conflict—political, economic, social—before they lead to armed combat. Our goal is to deter, not fight. But if deterrence fails we must still be ready and able to defend ourselves and our allies.

The keystone of our military strategy since World War II has been deterrence. Deterrence provides security by convincing potential adversaries that the risks and costs of aggression will exceed any conceivable gains. The U.S. seeks credible deterrence through our military strength, political resolve, and diplomacy. Our military strength and strategy deter by making a potential aggressor's assessments of war outcomes so uncertain and dangerous that any incentive for attacking is removed. A potential aggressor would face, and know he faces, the possibility of three types of responses that are inextricably linked.

First, defense: If we have a robust military capability to defend against aggression, then a potential adversary would realize that his aggression would fail on its own terms. Facing such a credible defense, he should be deterred.

Second, adequate response: An adversary must know that even if his aggression should succeed in achieving its immediate target, an attack on our vital interests would not be accepted by us without response, which might include escalation. The aggressor will know that, even if he wins the battle, he must face the likelihood that he will lose the war.

Third, retaliation: If an adversary confronts a credible threat that his aggression will trigger a response that imposes losses exceeding any possible gains, then he should understand that he can gain nothing from an attack.

Of these three sources of deterrence the most preferable and reassuring is defense because it is likely to be more credible and because it provides protection should deterrence fail.

Credible and prudent deterrence requires strong military capability. Mere threats are not enough. For example, when President Carter declared continued access to Persian Gulf oil to be a vital U.S. interest, our ability to deter attacks in that area, clearly of vital interest to the West, was weak. The United States had the capability neither to defend the oil fields of the Middle East, at the point of attack, nor to threaten adequate responses in that theater. Therefore, a major objective of the Reagan administration has been to strengthen our ability to deter aggression against our interests in that volatile area. We have enhanced American power projection capabilities so that if the Soviet leadership contemplated threatening our interests they would be deterred by the prospect of American troops who could fight with conventional weapons at the point of attack.

Since I will be returning next week to discuss the fiscal year 1986 defense budget with Congress, let me just briefly emphasize today how the priorities of the Reagan defense program are directly related to our strategy. I emphasize that each of these priorities is deemed vital, to give us the strength to deter attacks—in short, to be sure we never have to use our strong forces.

Readiness: To maintain the capability of the forces we now have, to respond quickly and effectively to aggression at the point of attack and defeat it.

Sustainability: To have the ammunition and equipment to fight with conventional arms long enough to make it clear that a Soviet attack could neither achieve a bold fait accompli or force the President to face the choice between defeat or instant escalation.

Mobility: To enable U.S. forces to get to the point of attack in time and to be supported until the attack is defeated.

Conventional modernization: To provide effective weapons systems capable of defeating numerically superior Soviet forces.

Strategic modernization: To assure that we maintain a balanced triad of survivable nuclear forces—land, sea, and air—to convince the Soviets that we could retaliate to a first strike, and therefore deter such an attack.

While our entire defense program is designed to support our strategy of deterrence and defense, the United States cannot unilaterally protect our worldwide interests. Nor can we hide behind the isolationist illusions of "fortress America." We must have strong allies and friends, and work closely with nations who share our goals. Based on the strategic foundations of the past four decades, the Reagan administration has strengthened our ties with our friends and allies around the world in pursuing a strategy of global deterrence.

A strong system of alliances and regional cooperation is indispensible to help America and its allies and friends preserve peace and freedom. Cooperating nations share common security challenges and achieve a division of labor capitalizing on the relative strengths of each State. The Reagan administration is determined to keep our alliances strong and encourage all partners to shoulder a fair share of the security burden.

U.S. strategy also derives great benefit from our security assistance and arms sales programs. These efficient, comparatively low cost programs help friendly countries make better use of their own often limited resources, and cope with security threats within or on their borders. Security assistance also reduces the likelihood that U.S. forces will be called upon to intervene in defense of a nation that would otherwise not be able to take care of its own defense. Secretary Shultz and I are in complete accord on the importance of security assistance and arms sales. I hope this committee will continue to support these essential tools of foreign policy and that you will continue to hold an open mind on all questions of arms sales until the administration has made its proposal and presented a rationale.

U.S. strategy must also continue to depend on our forward-deployed forces. The proximity of Soviet forces to our allies and overseas interests imposes severe demands on the timeliness of response, since territory once lost would be difficult to regain. Strong forward-deployed forces enable us to deter more credibly, defend more effectively, and reassure our allies more convincingly. U.S. deployments worldwide are the visible evidence that we are prepared and committed to defend our interests and back the policies we espouse.

ARMS REDUCTIONS

The American character has always depended on the strength of our ideals, not the use of force, to spread our vision of a better world. In this spirit, the United States has since the dawn of the nuclear age worked for controls on these awesome weapons. Unfortunately, our noble quest has yet to succeed. More than a decade of SALT negotiations neither achieved genuine reductions nor prevented an unprecedented Soviet build-up that continues to this day. Moreover, the Soviets have violated major arms control obligations and political commitments.

Because arms agreements can increase our security, President Reagan has committed this administration to the achievement of far-reaching, equitable, and verifiable nuclear arms reductions. America's quest for nuclear arms reductions provides us the opportunity to improve our deterrence and enhance international stability. To achieve these aims, we must proceed with toughness and patience, with full knowledge that Soviet leaders do not share the values of our American character. We have learned from the failures of the past and the record of Soviet violations that it is essential that future accords be precisely drafted and verifiable to ensure compliance by all parties.

We go to Geneva with improved prospects for genuine arms reductions. But to achieve success we must continue our strategic modernization program and demonstrate our resolve to stay strong. In fact, it was that resolve that brought the Soviets back to the negotiating table and now gives us a critical opportunity to achieve those arms reduction goals that have eluded mankind for far too long. In this regard, I must tell you frankly that cancellation of key programs, such as MX, will prolong negotiations, not facilitate them, and will reduce our ability to achieve arms reductions.

STRATEGIC DEFENSE

Earlier, I emphasized the key role of defense in deterring conflict. Strong defenses can strengthen nuclear as well as conventional deterrence. Through the strategic defense initiative we seek to explore a defensive alternative to the traditional strategic deterrence policy, which has been based on mutual vulnerability.

In a speech to the American people in March 1983, President Reagan introduced his vision of a world freed from the terror of nuclear ballistic missiles. Since then we have studied both the technological feasibility and the strategic implications of pursuing strategic defense; and we concluded that we should embark on a program to explore the potential of advanced, emerging defensive technologies to support a thoroughly reliable defense against nuclear ballistic missiles. Strategic defense can both strengthen deterrence and enhance our opportunities for arms reductions. By increasing significantly the uncertainty of success of a Soviet first strike, strategic defense will enhance deterrence. If the Soviet leaders ever contemplated initiating a nuclear attack, their purpose would be to destroy United States or allied military forces that would be able to oppose the aggression. Effective defenses that could deny the Soviet missiles the military objectives of their attack or deny the Soviets confidence in the achievement of those objectives, would discourage them from seriously considering such an attack. But unlike our current approach to deterrence based on retaliation, defenses will permit us to deter war by destroying weapons, not people.

Our strategic defense initiative also furthers our arms reduction efforts. It is a research program entirely consistent with the ABM treaty. What better way to encourage bold reductions in nuclear ballistic missiles than by devaluing their military usefulness. Thus, in addition to enhancing deterrence and stability, SDI could increase our chances to achieve a safer world through genuine arms reductions.

RESTORING THE PEACE

Few people have more clearly understood the need for a powerful military hand within the glove of diplomacy than President Reagan. But this administration is guided by the principle that military power should be used only as a last resort. We should be willing to use all sources of national power short of direct U.S. military intervention; yet, we should never rule out the use of force if deterrence fails. There is a deterrent value in never saying never.

The U.S. has erred in the past by being unwilling to use sufficient force to achieve our objectives, adhering to misguided notions about "gradual application of force." When a last resort decision is made to use force, because it is vital to our national interests to do so, it is necessary that we use sufficient force to win—that is to achieve a clearly defined objective as speedily as possible.

If we ever decide to commit our forces to combat, we must support those forces to the fullest extent of our national will for as long as it takes to win. That means we must maintain the necessary military force to achieve a clearly defined diplomatic objective—that is necessary to our vital interests and which cannot be achieved without use of military force.

As I stated earlier, the single most critical element of a successful democracy is a strong consensus of support and agreement for our basic purposes. Following from this, I developed and explained six tests for the uses of military power around which I hope public consensus can be forged. This does not imply the necessity of having full public support before we use force. It does mean that before the United States commits combat forces abroad there must be some reasonable assurance we will have the support of the American people and their elected representatives in Congress.

Just as we require public and congressional support for employing military force in war, we require that support to build the defenses necessary to preserve peace. That essential public support depends on a clear understanding of the strategic underpinnings of our defense program, a sober and realistic assessment of the challenges we face, and a vision of the opportunities for a more secure peace with freedom. It is for that reason that I fully support the efforts of this committee to review the goals and strategic premises of U.S. foreign policy, and to build a bipartisan commitment to pursue our strategy for realizing those opportunities for the United States, our friends and allies, and indeed all mankind.

TESTIMONY OF CYRUS VANCE BEFORE THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity to appear before this distinguished body again and to join with you in looking beyond immediate events to America's overall and future position in the world.

I hope and believe that these hearings can help to crystalize broader agreement on the general course that best suits our interests and needs in the coming years.

I do not believe that the development of a full consensus on a foreign policy is possible. In a world of growing complexity in which our interests are diverse, foreign policy is likely to remain the stuff of controversy.

Nonetheless, I do believe that despite differences on decisions that have been and will be made during the 1980s, our nation can shape a foreign policy consensus on our goals and the essential strands of a strategy to pursue them.

Mr. Chairman, our challenge in developing such a strategy is two-fold: first, to find ways to conduct debate of our foreign policy in a way that encourages rather than destroys a sense of national purpose and confidence; and second, to recognize the full range of enduring American interests which must be pursued in a world of rapid change. While these interests remain constant, the pace of change requires policies of flexibility and pragmatism.

Defining such an approach is no easy task in our nation; it is self-evident that a democracy faces a dilemma in fashioning its foreign policies. On one hand, successful diplomacy, especially the flexible diplomacy suited to a world of rapid change, often requires strong leadership that can decide on a course of action, pursue it consistently, and change course when necessary. There are many times, therefore, when a President must act swiftly to promote the best interests of the United States.

On the other hand, there can be no lasting support for a foreign policy unless, through free and open debate, it meets the concerns and values of the American people. Thus, the sometimes unsystematic and disorderly process of public debate and Congressional review seems to work against Presidential leadership. Not surprisingly then, Administration leaders sometimes wish that there was no Congress to consult, no barriers to overcome on Capitol Hill.

How do we deal with this dilemma? Some suggest that a return to a full consensus such as existed during the cold war should be our goal. To be sure, where we as a people do agree on a basic course—as we do, for example, in seeking to protect the security of this nation—we gain enormous strength. But as an encompassing principle, the search for full consensus is neither desirable nor possible.

There are several problems in trying to reach such a consensus. As foreign policy increasingly affects what happens here at home, the pulling and hauling of political debate is a natural, indeed necessary, part of the process of decision. Equally important, a consensus behind a single approach to foreign policy not only gives a blank check to an Administration; it also withdraws legitimacy from those dissenting voices that should be heard. They must be heard not only because this is a democracy, but also because they may well be pointing out serious, burgeoning errors. Moreover, given the state of public opinion and the complexity of foreign policy, it is doubtful that a blanket approval of an Administration's policy can be achieved.

What then can we do? I believe it is this: we can work first to achieve a broad national agreement on goals and basic national interests. We can also accept, and even encourage, debate about the best policies to achieve those goals. And we can pursue such debates with greater civility, less jockeying for partisan advantage, and more mutual trust—between the legislative and executive branches of government and among political viewpoints.

To do this will require us to start by taking a step backward. We need to stop caricaturing each other. For instance, to emphasize the need to spend more on defense does not mean that one craves war or is indifferent to its costs. To emphasize arms control does not mean that one is softheaded or soft on the Soviets. Both points of view flow from a common concern for national security. To question the patriotism or principles of one another is to substitute name-calling for needed thought.

Quite clearly, the United States is a strong and powerful nation. Indeed, the combination of U.S. political, economic, and military power is unequalled by any other nation. And the stewardship of that power has been important to every post-World War II administration, Republican and Democratic alike.

But the fact is that the United States now faces an international landscape in which our challenges are more varied, and the power of others to affect our lives more evident, than at any time since the early days of our history. This development cannot be ascribed to any basic failure of the United States. Other factors are involved. For example, many other nations have increased their capacity to project military force. One—the Soviet Union—has developed military forces that, overall, are roughly equal to our own. That power can now be projected in many parts of the world that were once physically unreachable.

Many nations have significantly increased their economic strength. Many countries, especially in the Third World, are now asserting a presence and demanding a role unheard of a generation ago.

Forces of change in the world are also leading to greater strife and turmoil. Low-level conflict is increasing, especially terrorism that spreads across borders. Political, cultural, economic—even religious—currents are eroding old assumptions and posing new challenges.

So simply in terms of the relative power, position, and presence of other nations, the United States is now living in a vastly different world that it was only a few decades ago.

At the same time, many other factors are changing. The pace of technology places extraordinary demands on the conduct of foreign affairs. Television brings us face-to-face with distant events. The speed of development of nuclear weapons outstrips our ability to control them. And what is called "information management" in the exploding age of the computer—whether on the battlefield or in the integration of world financial markets—changes the basic ways in which we have to think about the world.

The United States, meanwhile, has become vulnerable to the workings of the global economy in ways virtually without precedent. Our balance of trade, budget deficits, interest rates, the value of our dollar, the world prices of oil and agricultural goods—are no longer topics confined to the business pages of our newspapers. They now appear on the front page because they vitally affect both what happens at home and abroad. The United States has become a debtor nation. And we are finding that the management of our economic and foreign policies are increasingly linked.

In addition, there has been a decline in the perception and effectiveness of international institutions. The promise Americans once saw in the United Nations is increasingly questioned. Support for the UN specialized agencies is declining. And various aid institutions, partly because of inadequate funding, play a less effective role than they once did.

Mr. Chairman, I have sketched this litany of change not to suggest that we should be passive in the face of developments that threaten our interests or broader global needs. Nor did I suggest that we cannot or should not nurture American strengths. The issue is not whether we are strong. We are. The challenge is to use these unquestioned strengths appropriately and effectively to advance our interests in a world undergoing rapid and profound change.

In short, our policy must be one of strength, flexibility, and a willingness to adapt to change. We must understand that we are called upon to be wise as well as strong.

And in such a world, the beginning of wisdom is to define and agree upon our basic, enduring national interests.

I believe they are to be found in seven major areas that most command our attention. They are: national defense, arms control, East-West relations, an active diplomacy for peace, human rights, the domestic economy, and the international economy.

A STRONG NATIONAL DEFENSE

First, we must have a strong national defense. On this point there is, today, broad understanding. In recent years, we have seen growth in Soviet military power and the ability to project that power. The demands of defense in areas of US commitment—especially Western Europe, Japan, and parts of Asia and the Pacific Basin—have, if anything, been increasing. In some other areas, like the Persian Gulf, we have learned that there may be circumstances in which the use of US or allied military power would be essential for the protection of Western interests. And the steady increase in low-intensity conflict is requiring us to adapt to a changing military environment with new skills and new techniques.

What we most need, however, is not a defense budget of a particular size or pre-ordained composition. More important is a method for deciding what we need, how much we need, and how it will be used. These criteria should be the essence of the debate.

In assessing both the size and composition of the defense budget, we need continually to ask ourselves several pertinent questions:

How does US military power relate directly to our interests and responsibilities abroad?

What strategies should we pursue to protect those interests and meet those responsibilities? What is the role of military power within these strategies, perhaps coupled with political, economic, and other instruments? What other countries will be with us, and what will they contribute?

In the area of nuclear weapons, will a new program increase the stability of the arms balance? Or will it risk destabilizing that balance and increasing the risks of war?

In the area of conventional weapons, will a new program be cost-effective? Is it the best of resources? Will it meet the needs of the next decade rather than just today's?

These are key questions. Posing them can take us beyond sterile and arbitrary debate when we seek to determine "how much is enough?" It can help us understand the relationship between military strength and the realistic requirements of our security.

Posing these questions leads to several important conclusions. I would like to single out four of them:

First is the greater need for increased attention to conventional arms. This is the area of greatest deficiency. It is also the area in which a future challenge to our security is most likely to come. At the same time, the most important deficiencies lie less in equipment than in the stocks, ammunition, infrastructure, and training needed to make our conventional military forces more effective. Our fighting men and women demand no less of us.

Second, I believe we need to increase our ability to cope with unconventional warfare, with low-intensity conflict. This includes further development of capabilities like the Delta Force; further improvements in the collection and use of intelligence; and the greater integration of political and military efforts. This was a key lesson of our recent involvement in Lebanon.

Third, I support continued research at its present level into the possibility of defense against strategic nuclear attack. I do so because research is not prohibited by the Anti-ballistic Missile Treaty, because the Russians have been engaged in such research for a long time, as have we, because such research is not verifiable, and because sheer prudence requires us to do so. But I am strongly opposed to committing ourselves to pursuing the Strategic Defense Initiative beyond research. Technically, a leak-proof defense is an unrealizable dream. The means for defeating any defense of cities are too numerous. And the relative advantage between offense and defense overwhelmingly favors the offense. The Soviet reaction to the development and deployment of such a system will almost certainly be a large increase in the number of their offensive missiles, which we then will be compelled to match, and the arms spiral will be ratcheted upwards. Further the SDI concept does not come to grips with either the problem of attack by sea-launched cruise missiles or the deep concern of our allies about the decoupling effect of such a system. I have seen no evidence to suggest that the situation will change in the future. Moreover, the cost of pursuing such a course would run in the hundreds of billions of dollars.

In any event, I believe that, before we begin to modify today's strategic doctrines, we must be absolutely certain that what we put in their place will not make nuclear war more likely. It would be folly, at this time, to abandon an approach that has helped keep the peace in favor of one that seems, at first glance, to be less morally repugnant, if the upshot would be to increase the chances of nuclear Armageddon. There is no moral advantage in that.

Fourth, we should adopt a very clear test to judge whether to deploy new weapons systems that bear on the strategic nuclear balance: namely, do these weapons systems increase stability or decrease it? In addition, I should state that I do not believe in "bargaining chips" in the sense of building weapons that would not be in our interest to deploy if they could not be traded away—weapons, that is, that could decrease stability. A true "bargaining chip" is one whose deployment would, in the absence of some agreed limit on Soviet weapons, increase our security but which, in an appropriate trade with the Soviets, would increase our security more through eschewal than deployment.

In my judgment, the test of stability argues for our pursuing the so-called Midgetman Missile, with its mobility and single-warhead, instead of the silo-bound MX with its ten warheads. It argues for continued deployment of Pershing II and cruise missiles in Western Europe while arms control negotiations continue. But this test of stability also argues against the deployment of nuclear-tipped sea-launched cruise missiles. These cannot be distinguished from conventionally-armed sea-launched cruise missiles, thus degrading the conventional option and making the control of nuclear-armed sea-launched cruise missiles virtually impossible. I also believe that our best interest lies in imposing an immediate moratorium on the futher testing of anti-satellite weapons. Since we depend more than do the Soviets on these satellites, helping to foster a competition in satellite killers cannot be to our advantage. I further believe that we should seriously consider a bilateral moratorium on all nuclear testing, for a clearly defined period of time, coupled with the resumption of the tripartite Comprehensive Test Ban negotiations.

THE PURSUIT OF ARMS CONTROL

Mr. Chairman, a second fundamental national interest is arms control. At a time when the United States and the Soviet Union are poised to begin a new round of nuclear arms control negotiations, it is useful to remind ourselves why these talks are important. They grow out of a number of pertinent facts.

The fact is that today there are more than 50,000 nuclear warheads in the world. Most of them are far more powerful than the Hiroshima bomb that killed some 100,000 people. Together, they have manyhundred times the explosive force of all weapons used in all the wars in history. In strategic weapons alone, the United States and the Soviet Union will soon each have more than 10,000 nuclear warheads that could devastate one another's societies.

The fact is that there can be no victor in a nuclear war. No development even remotely on the horizon could make the pursuit of nuclear "victory" a rational act of policy for anyone.

The fact is that there is no plausible way to begin a nuclear war and then to bring it under control—to wage a so-called limited nuclear war—without inflicting destruction unprecedented in all of human history.

The basic lesson is that the two superpowers—and all other nations—are in this together. We are in the same boat, and we will survive or founder together. Neither the United States nor the Soviet Union can provide for its security against a nuclear holocaust unless it also helps to provide that security for the other. Neither can seek a decisive nuclear advantage over the other without the risk of provoking an attack in which both could be destroyed. Neither can use nuclear weapons without being devastated in turn. And both face new tasks and new imperatives, with the prospect that new complications—not least the Strategic Defense Initiative—will make stopping the arms race that much more difficult.

In short, the most basic security of all for the superpowers—security from nuclear war—cannot be found in competitive buildups. Their security must be mutual. It must be common.

I believe that these facts provide the basic principles for the negotiations that are soon to begin. I compliment President Reagan and Secretary Shultz for their concept of "umbrella talks," and for achieving a single negotiating forum with three sub-groups.

No one who has ever been involved in negotiating arms control agreements can be oblivious to their difficulties. The negotiations will be long and arduous. For the complexities of arms control are growing daily. The trade-offs required will demand great diligence and ingenuity on both sides. Issues like verification pose significant hurdles before agreements can be reached.

Some basic political principles should be followed:

We should not pursue agreement for agreement's sake; but we must recognize that agreement without fair compromise is unavailing, nay bootless.

We must negotiate seriously even if we cannot easily reach agreement. The American people rightly demand it, and the strength and cohesion of the Western Alliance depends upon it.

We recognize that arms control negotiations cannot and do not take place in a political vacuum. This fact argues for a broadening of US-Soviet dialogue, in order to help create the essential political underpinnings for arms control. At the same time, however, if US-Soviet political difficulties arise elsewhere in the world, we must be exceedingly cautious in attempting to link Soviet political behavior to the pursuit of arms control agreements. There is no merit in our trying to impose such "linkage." Any particular arms control agreement is either in our interest and should be pursued—or it is not and should not.

Finally, we must be patient and deliberate in our efforts to move the talks forward. Presidential leadership and control will be essential. Our arms control goals must be intimately related both to the arms we build and the doctrine we adopt. We must also beware—and urge the Soviets to beware—of taking unilateral steps that could make arms control agreements more difficult if not impossible to achieve.

Some of the debate we face today concerns whether we should be optimistic or pessimistic about these impending talks, about arms control itself. I am neither. I do, however, count myself among those who feel there is no more important task than pursuing these negotiations with the utmost seriousness and perseverance. But to validate that view, both the United States and the Soviet Union must be prepared to put first things first. They must place stability, reduced tensions, and human survival itself ahead of possible short-term gain. In domestic terms, no President for the last twelve years has been in a stronger position to make progress on this issue than is President Reagan.

EAST-WEST RELATIONS

The fact of a common strategic security emphasizes the importance of a third fundamental American interest: the successful management of East-West relations. As we fulfill the needs of defense and deterrence, we have an important interest in fashioning a relationship with the Soviet Union in which our fundamental competition is bounded by restraint. In so doing, we should avoid framing our discussions of East-West relations in ways that suggest a false choice between extremes: between a utopian state of detente on one hand and a condition of implacable hostility on the other. Both realism and safety require that we conduct relations in the continuum between those two poles. We have a basic interest in the containment of Soviet power and ideology; we also have a basic interest in world peace. Any policy must reconcile and promote both. At times there will be greater progress in finding areas of mutual restraint. At others, the adversarial elements in our relations will predominate. But there must always be elements of both. What then should be the elements of Western policy toward the Soviet Union?

The first element of our policy must be its durability—the capacity of successive US and allied governments to follow a more consistent expression of Western interests, extending beyond national elections or changes in the public mood. If we want Soviet leaders to understand what we expect of them in mutual relations, they must be able to predict our attitudes and behavior.

A second element must be the closeness of our partnership with like-minded states, beginning with those in Western Europe, on the course we seek for East-West relations. None of us will profit if we permit divisions to open between our respective views of the Soviet Union and of the best policy toward it, as happened with the Afghanistan and Poland crises. Within the West, we will disagree on some particulars because our interests are similar but not congruent. Yet we must demonstrate that we can work together on these issues so that our actions will have more political impact and will demonstrate that there is no advantage for Soviet leaders in trying to separate us from our allies.

Third, we and our allies must maintain the military force required to meet Soviet challenges, both in Europe and elsewhere, as need be. The Soviet Union must have no opportunity to test us militarily, or to exploit military advantages politically. It is never easy to define the line between sufficient military power and excessive reliance on military instruments, but, collectively, the Western allies must be able to make those judgments. And the Soviet leadership must know that we are prepared to pay the price necessary for our security. At the same time, we must seriously pursue fair and verifiable arms control agreements.

Fourth, we in the West collectively must distinguish those areas of East-West relations where there is no room for compromise from those areas where mutual agreement is possible. And we must lead a new generation of Soviet leaders to understand Western determination to defend our vital interests while seeking to expand those fields in which East and West can cooperate.

Fifth, during the last decade a major factor in the determination of East-West relations was the Soviets' lack of restraint in exploiting local conflicts in the hope of expanding their influence. When an opportunity does come for more sensible management of East-West relations, it will be important to find ways to increase that restraint. While it is not feasible to develop across-the-board "codes of conduct," we can seek practical limitations in specific regions of the world where both have an interest in keeping political competition from reaching explosive levels.

Sixth, we should adopt a policy of sustained engagement toward the Soviet bloc as suggested in the recent Statement of the Aspen International Group ("Managing East-West Conflict")—a consistent and long-term policy which would protect Western interests, reduce the competition, and over time influence Soviet policy for the better. Sustained engagement should rest on the twin pillars of Western strength and flexibility. To effect these objectives, there must be an increase of Western points of contact with the East in all fields—political, military, economic, scientific and cultural. This means that the West should keep its powder dry while emphasizing its seriousness in cooperating with the East where possible. Such an overall Western policy requires not only increased dialogue among the Western nations, but also greater European participation (collective and unified, where possible) in Western decision making.

We and our allies must continue talking with the Soviet Union in order to make our concerns clear. There can be no excuse for halting communications in times of tension when clarity about each other's intentions is vital to stability and peace.

Finally, we must think of our relations with the Soviet Union in terms of decades, not simply from year to year. Our long-term position must make clear to present and future Soviet leaders that we are prepared to have a positive relationship with a Soviet Union that does not seek to dominate other countries, and that accepts a constructive and responsible role in the world.

ACTIVE DIPLOMACY FOR PEACE

A fourth American interest lies in the pursuit of an active diplomacy for peace. I have already talked about the need for strong US military defenses. But we cannot rely on military strength alone to deter, prevent, or cope with trouble. We must continue to place special emphasis on strengthening our alliances—not just militarily, but politically and economically as well. We need to continue developing constructive relations with the world's largest nation, the People's Republic of China. We need to continue working with other nations in reducing the risks of nuclear proliferation. And we also need to be more active in helping to resolve Third World conflicts in key parts of the world, if we are to avoid being drawn into them. Prudence points to peacemaking as a first step, and the use of military power, where necessary, as a last resort.

At the same time, timely and effective peacemaking by the United States can decrease the chances that the Soviet Union will benefit from turmoil, especially in the developing world. Peacemaking can dry up troubled waters in which Moscow is often inclined to fish.

We know the record of successful US peacemaking in recent years, in areas of vital interest to this nation. The Nixon, Ford, and Carter Administrations all had notable successes, especially in the Middle East. In addition, southern Africa is less threatened by instability because of our joint efforts with Great Britain in Zimbabwe. We hear little or nothing about the Panama Canal today because of the existence of the once controversial treaties that were hammered out by the joint efforts of Republican and Democratic administrations. And in a related field of flexible diplomacy, bipartisan successes in normalizing and strengthening relations with China have presented us with a far more hopeful future in East Asia than could otherwise have been possible.

The challenge to American peacemaking continues unabated. In the Middle East, we have learned over the years that US disengagement from the role of mediator leads more often to conflict than to peace. The United States now faces critical choices in Central America: do we have both the will and the ability to reach sensible arrangements for regional security; or will we slide into military conflict in Nicaragua or El Salvador? We continue to have an interest, if too little opportunity to act, in seeing an end to fighting in the Persian Gulf. We must continue to pursue diplomatic efforts to end Soviet aggression in Afghanistan. And we must continue our efforts to bring about a peaceful solution in Namibia and an end to the evils of apartheid in South Africa.

With its renewed popular mandate—and now that it has met its first priority of beginning talks with the Soviet Union on arms control—the Reagan Administration has the chance to pursue active US efforts to resolve some of the underlying conflicts that threaten our interests. Precisely when and how to go about this diplomacy is a matter of tactics that goes beyond the scope of my testimony, today. But it is important that the United States recommit itself to its role as peace-maker in areas of the world important to us. I for one would welcome and applaud that recommitment.

COMMITMENT TO HUMAN RIGHTS

Fifth, I believe the United States must rekindle its commitment to human rights.

I reject the idea that the pursuit of human rights and the pursuit of national self-interest are incompatible. Of course, we cannot escape those difficult decisions that sometimes are required. We must constantly weigh how best to advance human rights while conducting essential business with governments, even unpopular ones, in countries where we have important security interests. But the fact remains that, over the longer term, our pursuit of human rights is not only compatible with our national security, but contributes to it.

In country after country, we have learned that views divergent from those of repressive regimes cannot be long repressed without sowing the seeds of violence. Once ties are broken between a government and its people, outside intervention cannot secure its long-term survival. Thus it is profoundly in our national interests to support constructive change before such ties erode and the alternatives of radicalism or repression drive out moderate solutions.

Each society must decide for itself how to manage change. We cannot and should not write social contracts for others. But we can encourage and help others to promote peaceful and orderly reform. In the process we will be true to ourselves.

In short, we pursue our human rights objectives not only because they are right, but because we have a stake in the stability that comes when people can express their hopes and find their futures freely. Our ideals and our interests thus coincide.

A SOUND NATIONAL ECONOMY

Sixth, we clearly have a vital interest in a sound national economy. It is the cornerstone on which all else is based. I cannot emphasize too strongly that the economic foundations of our national security are every bit as important as the defense component. Creating viable military defenses requires that we have the requisite economic wherewithal, trained workforce, advanced technology, and high standards of economic performance. There is also no doubt that the quality of the US economy affects the way we project ourselves to others—the degree of confidence we have as we pursue our foreign policy goals.

During the past several years, we have achieved significant successes in our domestic economy. Under President Carter, we made substantial progress in coming to grips with the energy problem. Under President Reagan, inflation has decreased dramatically and economic investment and output have increased.

I believe all of us would agree that we cannot ignore the imperatives of sound economic policy for the next several years. Our unprecedented budget and trade deficits must be confronted now. Our hard-hit export industries, as well as our domestic industries competing with low price imports, need relief from the overvalued dollar. Our capacity to use economic instruments like foreign aid—often a substitute for later security actions—must be resuscitated.

As we look to the next few years, we know that we are facing a time of economic choice without precedent in recent decades. This will require us to take a fresh and harder look at defense spending. In this connection, we must eschew unnecessary duplication of weapons systems, cut waste, better rationalize our weapons procurement with the types of conflict and missions our forces may face, and recognize the substantial economic benefits of arms control.

A STRONG INTERNATIONAL ECONOMY

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I believe that American foreign policy will be tested in terms of our ability to help preserve and develop a strong international economy in the years ahead. The depth of our ties to the global economy is beyond dispute; and so is the impact of our domestic economic health on the prosperity of others—including allies on whose strength we depend.

In recent years we have come to understand better the demands placed upon us in keeping the global economy functioning in ways that can benefit us and others. We have seen the oil shocks, the debt crises, the stagflation exported from one country to another.

Today, we face a particular need to avoid protectionism, which will inevitably grow unless both we and other developed countries are quick to contain it. Here, American leadership is again required. I do not agree with those, in either political party, who argue that we should lead the way to raising the barriers. As in other times of global economic difficulty, the United States should lead in the direction of a more open international trading system. As in the past, that course offers the best promise for both ourselves and others.

Yet the United States must also insist that other countries join with us in playing by the rules. The multilateral trading system can only work if it is just that: respected by all economies for the benefit of all. I believe in fair as well as free trade. Indeed, if it does not become more fair, I fear that it will become less free than it is today.

In reviewing the agenda of international economic problems, I am particularly concerned by what is happening in the Third World. In recent years, as we have faced our own economic problems, we have paid less and less attention to burgeoning economic threats to the vast majority of mankind. This myopia will severely damage our interests even as it stifles hope in country after country in the Third World. It has merely put off the day of reckoning. It has increased the chances of strife and turmoil that we will then be tempted to meet through non-economic means.

What we have seen recently on television in Ethiopia was not the exception. It risks becoming the rule, certainly in some parts of sub-Saharan Africa and potentially in other forms elsewhere. Yet by postponing our effective involvement in the overarching economic problem of Third World development, we saddle ourselves with future trouble of staggering size. By too often letting short-term political criteria, rather than economic need, determine both whether and how we will provide assistance, we risk distorting our aid efforts to our own ultimate disadvantage.

It is not popular to emphasize development assistance at a time of national economic stringency in the face of budget deficits. But if we compare what we can spend today on foreign assistance with what we may have to spend tomorrow on military weapons, then this emphasis is clearly placed correctly.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Chairman, these are seven areas of U.S. foreign policy that, in my judgment, must command our attention at this time. I have focused on them not because they exhaust all of our responsibilities, to ourselves and to others, but because each represents a basic national interest. Poll after poll shows that the American public well understands the importance of each to our future.

Thus, any American foreign policy, if it is to succeed abroad and gain support at home, must include the pursuit of all of these interests.

Of course, these goals often compete for our attention and for our resources—requiring decisions whose difficulties all this Committee understands only too well, as when judging the effects of military spending on our domestic economy.

But there can be no alternative to striking a balance among them, and to understanding how they combine as well as collide—for example, how arms control agreements, by constraining the Soviets' strategic posture, make our own defense planning easier.

And to have an effective foreign policy, our society must do more than define its interests and carefully debate the proper balance among them. While we discuss specific policies designed to protect and promote these interests, let us dedicate ourselves to two actions of comity.

First, on those most important of decisions, when we must send young Americans into the danger of combat abroad, let us act together. Because the road we then choose to take is likely to be hard, it is essential that our system work, that all voices be heard and a near consensus reached before we act. If not, as we have learned, divisions at home can lead to devastating inconstancies abroad. This is why I believe the Congress must not weaken the War Powers Act. Rather, for the sake of cohesion and constancy when we commit ourselves to military action, it should, if anything be strengthened.

Second, as we debate, let us remember the importance of pragmatic compromise. It is the necessary lubricant in the complicated, wonderful machinery of our political system. Compromise is less exciting than controversy. It works its way less easily into the headlines and may, in times of heated debate, find a narrow place in our hearts. But it is essential to democracy no less than to diplomacy. I thus applaud the spirit, Mr. Chairman, in which you and your Committee have called these hearings.●

PRESS CONFERENCE BY BROOKLYN RIVERA

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, while Congress and the administration debate armaments in Nicaragua, few have taken note of the important progress being made in efforts to bring about a peaceful settlement to a 3-year conflict in the country's Atlantic coast. Brooklyn Rivera, the leader of the Indian rebel group Misurasata, has been negotiating with the Nicaraguan Government for a peaceful settlement of the Miskito, Sumu, and Rama Indians' war to secure land rights and autonomy for Nicaragua's indigenous people.

Last fall, Mr. Rivera began these negotiations and secured the first exchange of prisoners between the Sandinistas and one of its armed enemies. The Nicaraguan Government's refusal to cease hostilities against the Indian people during the negotiations has forced the cancellation of subsequent meetings. Mr. Rivera recently held a press conference to ask support for the cause of the Indian people and to urge Members of Congress to encourage the resumption of the talks.

Thousand of Indians fled the country in an effort to escape attack and forced relocation by the Sandinistas. By its own admission, the Nicaraguan Government has disregarded the culture and traditions of its Indian people in its effort to incorporate the Indian people into the Sandinista, revolution. Miskito, Sumu, and Rama peoples have been tortured, murdered, intimidated, and coerced by both the Sandinista Government and by the Contra groups.

The issue is one of human rights, not ideology. In the words of Brooklyn Rivera, "It is neither left nor right, capitalist nor Communist—it is Indian." Misurasata's struggle represents the struggle of all indigenous people against racism and injustice. Brooklyn Rivera's peace initiative deserves the support of Congress and of this administration.

Mr. President, I ask that the full text of Brooklyn Rivera's press conference and the news statement by the National Congress of American Indians may be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

BROOKLYN RIVERA: GENERAL COORDINATOR OF MISURASATA

In my capacity as General Coordinator of Misurasata (Miskito, Sumu, Rama, Sandinista, Aslatakanka), the one legitimate organization of the Indian peoples of Nicaragua, I am presenting this declaration to the national and international public about the present situation of the Indian people of Nicaragua and about the fight of my brothers and sisters as well as the peace initiatives in the last months between the Indian leaders and the Government of Nicaragua. I am also presenting information about the shameful activities of the Sandinistas as well as the contras who are harming the interests and threatening the future of my people. I have held the position of General Coordinator since May of 1980 through the popular will of my brothers, and it is by tradition my obligation to carry out this historical responsibility.

One should note in particular in the present situation in Nicaragua both the plight of the Miskito, Sumu and Rama people and of the rest of my Indian brothers in the Central American region. The type of conflicts which the Indian peoples of Central America are experiencing varies from one country to another, but there is a common base to all: Resistance and fighting by the Indian peoples for survival against the neocolonial practices of the nation states. The fight of Indian peoples is to secure dignity and liberation and the reestablishment of their historic right to the land, to their autonomy and the peaceful coexistence with other peoples of the country. Therefore, the Indian fight is different in its origin, nature and objectives from the struggles of other groups and forces which are in conflict in those countries.

In the case of the existing conflict between the Indians and the Sandinista government in revolutionary Nicaragua, we see the conflict is considered simply between Sandinistas and Somocistas, or as the East-West problem. In reality, the Indian resistance is not a product of the clashing of political or ideological interests with the regime of Managua. Rather, it is the result of the government's intentions to control our territory and to make the Indian population submissive to the Sandinista state. The interests of the Indians of Nicaragua are based on the shared identity of the Miskito, Sumu and Rama people, their communal territory, their kinship and historic ties. Moreover, the revolution is not in conflict with the Indians simply because of the so-called errors committed by the Sandinista front, but, rather, because of the fundamental differences between the state and the Indian peoples over concepts of rights, interests, and sovereignty.

Therefore, the Indian fight is neither of the right wing nor of the left wing. It is of the Indian wing. But it is revolutionary because it is seeking the liberation and the defense of the interests of indigenous peoples. Likewise, it seeks to realize the aspirations and to develop the human resources of Indian peoples.

Thus, it is clear that the resistance of Indian peoples is based on legitimate principles, on a fight to reclaim that which is rightfully theirs: Ethnic identity and their aborigional rights to their land and autonomy. One should never confuse the Indians' fight with other wars or confrontations involving greed or foreign interests.

Faced with the obvious failure of their warlike solution to the Indian conflict and with the urgent necessity to improve the international image of their deteriorating revolution, the Government of Nicaragua during these last few months has changed the way they've handled the problem. In the midst of this new development, in December 1984, Misurasata began formal talks with the Government of Nicaragua to try to find a peaceful solution to the existing conflict. For our Indian organization this initiative represents an opportunity to explore the possibility of a just peace and the reestablishment of the historic rights of our people. We also hope that these negotiations will establish an international precedent for the peaceful resolution of conflicts involving the fundamental issues in the relations of Indian peoples and the nation states.

During the first meeting at Bogota, Colombia, on the 8th and 9th of this past December, the Indian delegation presented a written proposal. This proposal is a basic document for negotiations leading towards a treaty of peace and recognition of the territory and autonomy of our Miskito, Sumu and Rama people within the Nicaraguan state. There was every indication that the Government of Nicaragua's delegation had been instructed to negotiate within the framework of the State by making some adjustments or reaccommodations in the state apparatus but without making any fundamental or "revolutionary" changes in the political and economic relations between Nicaragua and the Miskito, Sumu and Rama peoples.

We see that while the Sandinistas were affirming that they are constructing a socialist revolution in Nicaragua, as far as their relation to the Indian peoples they were defending the same traditional, racist politics as any other ultraconservative government of the Americans. The Nicaraguan Government is trying to convert the indigenous peoples into a new type of "Indian" who would be without ethnic identity or rights, assimilated into the culture of the ladinos (the dominant non-Indians) and subjected to the interests of the State. We can see an example of this within the "asentamientos" (relocation camps) where our brothers and sisters have already been subjected to this ethnocidal experience.

Even though the government of Nicaragua has appeared to be favorably disposed towards the peace process, Misurasata has from the beginning been faced with a series of artificial obstacles which are a product of the intransigence and manipulations of the Sandinista regime. Some of the greatest obstacles in the steps toward peace are:

(a) Misatan, a pseudo organization consisting of supporters of the Sandinista Front and elements of members of State Security and the Party who are trying to manipulate the Indian conflict and the Indian resistance.

(b) Comision nacional de los estatutos de la autonomia (national commission for the development of a state autonomy statute), recently created for international propaganda and for pretending to give autonomy to the Indians.

(c) Manipulation of an "autonomy statute" built on an artificial and adulterated foundation—obviously intended for international public opinion, not for the recognition of historic Indian rights.

(d) Furthermore, the government, with its accustomed "authority", has threatened to impose this so-called "autonomy statute" with or without MISURASATA participation.

We deeply regret the need to cancel our negotiations scheduled for January 19th in Bogota. But the intransigent position of Managua, with its recent escalation of military conflict, attacking even our civilian population, leaves us no choice. It makes no sense to speak of peace if the Sandinistas are striking even more intensely against our civilian population.

Nevertheless, MISURASATA reaffirms its course, its conviction that the only viable route in the East Coast of Nicaragua is a peace based on justice for the Indian village people. We expect the Sandinista government will also move in a more positive manner at this time, sparing our civilian population unnecessary bloodshed. If they would but do that, we could move forward and fix a new date for negotiations in Bogota.

It is once again necessary for me to clarify, before international public opinion, that the MISURASATA movement and organization emerges from the very bosom of our Indian culture. It is neither left nor right, capitalist nor communist—it is Indian. No other Indian organization within this conflict, MISATAN nor MISURA, can make that claim. They are used both by left and by right to manipulate the true Indian issues.

It is clear that MISURA isn't Indian nor does it represent at any time the interests of Indians. But for the Fuerza Democratica Nicaraguense (FDN) and the three so-called Indian elements, MISURA would not exist at all. The group called MISATAN isn't Indian either. This group represents only the interests of the Party and the Sandinistas. As it is, outside of the FSLN and the ten supposed Indian elements, MISATAN doesn't exist. Both MISURA and MISATAN show unequivocally the interests of the forces of the right and the left in the manipulation of Indians.

But the counterrevolution has failed as well with their bare-faced intentions of manipulation. MISURA, with its psychopath Fagoth as its head, has not produced results in spite of massive support and abundant publicity on the part of its patrons. All of those groups called "contras," including UNIR (F.D.N., MISURA Y ARDE-Robelo) and ARDE-Pastora are dedicated to dirty manipulations against us, are trying to destroy us. Within the last few days they have mounted a diversionary show in San Jose, Costa Rica to confuse international opinion. The leaders of UNIR, elements of ARDE (Pastora) and right-wing Cuban residents in that country have used money to bribe three MISURASATA organizers for this deceitful act, the false claim that they have taken control of our organization. These men pretend that the Indians are their concern when they only want to use them for their own political ends. Racist against us and feeling that the efforts of peace of MISURASATA are a threat to their interests, they are determined to destroy the organization politically. They continue to think that we Indians ought to follow them and that they are the ones that ought to speak for the Indians. The true Indian leaders have already responded courageously to this with their communication of five days ago in San Jose. The Indian fight pertains only to the Indians. How can those men pretend that the Indians are their allies when they won't even speak with them about their aboriginal rights?

But I am convinced that the counterrevolution will not remain satisfied with their attempts at political destruction of the legitimate native leaders. It will attempt to eliminate us physically. We publicly denounce the schemes of these men against the integrity of our leaders and in particularly against my person. The enemies of the Indian people as much on the right as on the left have always acted without morals or scruples during the pursuit of their malevolent goals.

But the peace initiative will go forward despite the maneuverings of the enemies of our people. We call for the help of all honest people and organizations that support this dignified search for peace as a responsible alternative to the existing conflict. It is time to work to alleviate the present situation of anguish of the Miskito, Sumu and Rama peoples. We, the true Indian leaders, are working in that direction in contrast to the racist pretensions of the enemies of our people on the right and on the left. We need the solidarity of all people and organizations that truly are concerned with the Indian problem in Nicaragua.

There will be no national peace without justice for the Indians.

National Congress of American Indians

[News Statement]

WASHINGTON, DC (1/29/85).—"The East-West issues and the objectives of the left and the right ideologies have overshadowed the life-threatening situation of the Indian people and their struggle to survive in Nicaragua," said Suzan Shown Harjo, Executive Director of the National Congress of American Indians. "It is time that all people pay attention to the future of the Indian people, and to call upon all parties to assure their future and to stop using them as a political football."

The National Congress of American Indians, established in 1944 to promote Indian treaty, traditional, cultural and property rights, is the oldest and largest national membership organization of American Indian and Alaska Native governments and people.

In accordance with its attached resolution concerning the urgent situation of Central America Indian Peoples in the face of violence and genocide, with particular references to the situations in El Salvador, Guatemala and Nicaragua, the National Congress of American Indians supports the Misurasata in its efforts to negotiate a just and peaceful solution that will assure the future survival and well-being of the Sumo, Rama and Miskito Indian nations and their people.

NATIONAL CONGRESS OF AMERICAN INDIANS
RESOLUTION NO. 3-82

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS

The more than fifteen million Indigenous peoples (Indians) located within the asserted boundaries of Panama, Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Honduras, El Salvador, Belize, Guatemala and Mexico constitute majority populations within their respective territorial enclaves. The majority of Central American Indigenous peoples retain their own cultural practices, their own native languages and internal political systems and have maintained their distinct group identity despite Spanish and British colonization of their territories and subsequent formation of eight nation-states by Spanish and British descendants. None of the Central American states recognize the distinct political character, nor do the individual states recognize the right of indigenous peoples to participate in the state governments as distinct political groups. (Note: Indigenous group representation in the Nicaraguan government was accepted in the new Council of State formed by the Sandinista regime, but was terminated in 1981.) The indigenous populations of Mexico and Central America are treated as peasants at the bottom of the general economic system, though in reality indigenous peoples are forced, by virtue of their Indian lineage, to live as the poorest of the poor.

Over the generations, rival groups of Spanish and/or British descendents have met in violent confrontations to control the various state governments which have in turn, formulated laws or used violence to confiscate indigenous lands and natural resources for the direct benefit of a minority of wealthy, landed families. Thus forced off of their rich lands into less productive lands, indigenous populations in Central America and Mexico now occupy the last remaining parts of their original homelands. During the last twenty-five years, indigenous territories now occupied, have been found to contain vast amounts of petroleum, gold, nickle, timber and other raw materials of economic importance to the wealthy, landed families; and of significant strategic importance to the industrial states of North America and Europe.

The current violence in Central America reflects a resurgence of rivalries among non-indigenous groups seeking to hold or gain control over the instruments of state government to gain ultimate control over the newly found wealth in the remaining indigenous territories. In the course of resurgent violence, acts of genocide and ethnocide are being committed against indigenous groups. Indigenous populations are caught between the rival forces as a third political force which holds ideals and aspirations, values and political views in opposition to non-indigenous rivals.

Non-indigenous rival forces in Guatemala are directly and indirectly responsible for the violent deaths of an estimated 25,000 indigenous Mayan people during the last ten years, and the dislocation of thousands more who have become refugees in other countries. The Guatemalan government, private death squads, and their non-indigenous rivals are carrying out a deliberate policy of genocide to deny the Mayan peoples their fundamental human rights, their territorial rights and their livelihood as a peaceful people by confiscating Mayan lands and natural resources for the benefit of wealthy, landed families, national and multi-national corporations and for the benefit of nations which receive import products from the exploitation of Mayan lands and natural resources.

The Mayan population constitutes the majority population in Guatemala living under the domination and control of a minority which holds control over the military and instruments of goverance. The ruling minority uses torture, intimidation and coercion against the Mayan majority to secure virtual slave labor; and the ruling minority practices torture, mass murder, intimidation and coercion to induct Mayan men and boys into the military to carry out insurgency and counter insurgency actions among the minority population and against Mayan communities. Weapons and armaments widely used against indigenous communities are imported to Guatemala from the United States, Brazil, Israel, Venezuela, Chile and Eastern Block states through government-to-government sales or through the private black market.

Non-indigenous rival forces in El Salvador are directly and indirectly responsible for the violent deaths of an undetermined number of Indigenous Pipiles (Nahuat-Pipiles) whose collective population is estimated at 360,000. EL Salvadoran government officials, private militias, death squads and their rival counterparts are carrying out a deliberate policy of genocide against the Pipiles to deny them their fundamental human rights, their territorial rights and their livehood as a peaceful people. The Pipiles constitute a majority population within their own region, living under the domination and control of a majority which holds control over the military and instruments of goverance. Rival forces within the majority use torture, intimidation and coercion against the Pipiles to secure virtual slave labor; and the ruling majority practices torture, mass murder, intimidation and coercion to induct Pipiles men and boys into the military to carry out insurgency and counter insurgency attacks within the majority population and against Pipile coummunities. Weapons and armaments widely used against indigenous communties are imported to El Salvador from the United States, Argentina, Venezuela and Israel through government-to-government sales and transfers, and through the private black market from Libya, Western Block states and Eastern Block states.

Non-indigenous rival forces in Nicaragua, in the border areas of Honduras and Costa Rica and in Guatemala are carrying out acts of genocide and ethnocide against the indigenous Miskito, Sumu and Rama peoples who have a combined population exceeding 180,000. The Miskito, Sumu and Rama constitute the majority population living on the Atlantic Coast, in Zelaya Department, within the asserted boundaries of Nicaragua. Acts of violence against the Miskito, Sumu and Rama have been precipitated by the 1979 overthrow of the Anastasio Samoza Regime by the "Frente Sandinista De Liberacion Nacional" (F.S.L.N.) which subsequently established the Sandinista Regime.

An undetermined number of Miskito, Sumu and Rama have been murdered by the military and insurgency forces of the former Samoza Regime operating from protected enclaves in Honduras and Costa Rica with the covert aid of the United States government, paramilitiary forces in Florida and California, and covert forces organized by Argentina, Chile and other South and Central American states. These enclave and covert forces are using torture, mass murder, intimidation and coercion to induct Miskito, Sumu and Rama men and boys into their ranks to carry out violent actions against Miskito, Sumu and Rama communities, and against communities and installations under the control of the Sandinista Regime.

The Sandinista Regime has enacted a policy entitled "Declaration of the Popular Sandinista Revolution in Regards to the Indigenous Communities of the Atlantic Coast" which contemplates forcible assimilation of Miskito, Sumu and Rama peoples and their territories into Nicaraguan society despite their relative independence prior to 1979. The Sandinista policy further contemplates annexation and confiscation of Miskito, Sumu and Rama territories and natural resources against the will of the coastal indigenous peoples. These policies are now being executed as demonstrated by the forced relocation of more than 8,500 Miskito from their native villages to permanent government controlled "model communities". The Miskito, Sumu and Rama peoples are being tortured, murdered, intimidated and coerced by representatives of the Sandinista Government and the United States supported forces seeking to overthrow the Sandinista Government. Weapons and armaments from France, Libya, the United States, Cuba, the Soviet Union, Argentina, Israel, Brazil and Chile provided through government-to-government sales and transfers, and through the black market are being used against the indigenous Miskito, Sumu and Rama peoples.

The acts of violence against indigenous peoples, as revealed by events in Guatamala, El Salvador and Nicaragua, demonstrate a systematic and calculated pattern of state supported and rival group supported practice of genocide and ethnocide against the indigenous peoples of Central America. The states of Argentina, Chile, Brazil, Honduras, Venezuela, Israel, United States, Libya, France, the Soviet Union and Cuba, are by virtue of their arms and weapons sales, knowingly or unknowingly, contributing to acts of genocide and ethnocide against indigenous peoples in Central America.

Whereas, in consideration of the Founding principles upon which the Constitution of the National Congress of American Indians is based, where member Tribal Governments are committed to the preservation of Indian cultural values, the equitable adjustment of Indian Affairs, the preservation of Indian rights, the promotion of the common welfare of the American Indian; and a better understanding of Indians, and

Whereas, recalling that the National Congress of American Indians is a Charter member of the World Council of Indigenous Peoples, founded in Port Alberni, Canada on October 27-30, 1975, and is, thereby, committed under that Charter to: "Promote unity of Indigenous peoples through knowledge and organization; to combat racism, to abolish genocide and ethnocide; to ensure political, economic and social justice; and to establish equality among indigenous peoples and other peoples of the world"; and

Whereas, recalling that the National Congress of American Indians has from time-to-time extended its support and assistance to indigenous populations throughout the Western Hemisphere through the adoption of relevant resolutions in convention; and

Whereas, recalling that the National Congress of American Indians has mandated international initiatives to organize and promote supportive action within the United Nations and other international organizations to stop national government policies of genocide and ethnocide against tribal peoples in South America, Central America, North America, the South Pacific and Northern Europe, as provided in the "Tribal/Global Relations: Policy & Action Plan for the 80's" adopted by the 37th Annual National Congress of American Indians Convention, October 28, 1980; and

Whereas, recognizing that the rights of indigenous peoples to self-determination and self-government are accepted international law, and have been increasingly given effect in the domestic law of States; and

Whereas, considering that the recognition of the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of individuals and of peoples are the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world, and considering that these principles are recognized and proclaimed in the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the European Convention on Human Rights and the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights; and

Whereas, the indigenous peoples of Central America and Mexico are suffering from systematic and calculated genocide and ethnocide due to the actions of State governments and their rivals; and the indigenous Indian peoples of Central America and Mexico are suffering from the systematic and calculated efforts of States to force assimilation, annex indigenous territories, and expropriate and confiscate indigenous lands and natural resources.

Now therefore be it resolved, that the National Congress of American Indians does hereby, proclaim its endorsement and support of the indigenous peoples of Central America and Mexico and offers its assistance and participation in World Council of Indigenous Peoples sponsored commissions or other actions which may be instituted to protect Indian rights in Central American and Mexico.

Be it further resolved, that the National Congress of American Indians does call upon the World Council of Indigenous Peoples to receive this resolution and transmit it to the good offices of the United Nations, Organization of American States, Organization of Non-Aligned Countries, the European Human Rights Commission, the U.N. Human Rights Commission, the Inter-American Human Rights Commission, the Foreign Ministries of all of the hostile States governments, representatives of hostile rival groups located in Central America and Mexico, and the relevant international press.

Be it further resolved, that the National Congress of American Indians does direct its President and Executive Committee and staff to take all necessary steps to express our collective outrage and the contents of this resolution to the Executive and Legislative offices of the United States Government relevant to our concerns.

Be it finally resolved, that the National Congress of American Indians does direct its President and Executive Committee and relevant staff to take all necessary steps to convey the contents of this resolution to the U.S. electronic media and press, and to the Central American Regional Indigenous Council (CORPI) with all deliberate speed.●

TODD ZEPHIER

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I would like to take a moment to honor a courageous young man from South Dakota, Sgt. Todd Zephier. On January 11, 1985, Sergeant Zephier was killed in the Pershing II missile accident in West Germany. Todd was a 23-year-old American Indian.

Most of Todd's life was spent at Marty Indian School, a boarding school located southwest of Wagner, SD. There, Todd is remembered as a model student in every way—intelligent, talented, and of uncompromising discipline. In his high school yearbook, he is described as being of "profound mind and reserved nature." While at Marty Indian School, Todd was also the recipient of the "good character" award in both his junior and senior years.

Sister Pat Mylott, one of Todd's teachers, remembered him as one who had shown much promise and who stood out among her students. Of Todd, Sister Mylott says: "I guess the thing that stands out most is integrity." She recalls that once when she handed out too much lunch money, Todd offered to give up all of his money to make up the difference.

Todd's personal life exemplified him as an extremely honorable young man. The priests at Marty Indian School hoped Todd would attend a Catholic seminary. Instead, Todd chose to serve his country and joined the U.S. Army. During his 3 years of service, he sent most of his earnings home to his children and his mother.

A wise man once said that "greater love has no man than that he lay down his life for a friend." Todd, killed overseas while serving his country, gave his life for over 230 million friends—his countrymen. It is because of people like Todd who loved their country so much that they were willing to die for it, that we live in freedom today. I hope that all will know Sgt. Todd Zephier was an outstanding South Dakotan and American.

Mr. President, I offer my condolences to Sergeant Zephier's family. Todd remains an inspiration to many young people in South Dakota and I believe this a great tribute to a truly remarkable young man.●

CUT THE NUMBERS OF WEAPONS SYSTEMS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, a few weeks ago, in U.S. News & World Report, our colleague, Senator SAM NUNN, had an interview that appealed to me for having a great deal of common sense to it.

I am inserting it in the RECORD in the hope that all of us who have not had a chance to read it will see it.

Every time I see SAM NUNN's comments about the defense area, I recognize that this Nation is fortunate to have his services in the Senate and that at some time he would make an incredibly fine Secretary of Defense if a President could persuade him to take that position.

The interview follows:

"CUT THE NUMBER OF WEAPONS SYSTEMS"

(By Senator Sam Nunn)

Q. Senator Nunn, how far should the President go to cut the defense budget in his bid to reduce the federal deficit?

A. There are two features of that to consider. One is how much the administration can save within the defense budget itself, and the second is how much the President can buy in additional domestic savings by demonstrating to Congress a willingness to cut defense. The second consideration is probably the more important in achieving actual savings.

Q. Can defense spending be frozen without disrupting the planned military buildup?

A. No. I think you pay some price for a freeze. If you freeze military pay, for example, you pay some price in terms of lower morale of the forces and lower recruitment and retention. There's no such thing as cutting the defense budget several billion dollars without having an impact.

But the real question that has to be asked is whether the impact of defense cuts is worth accepting in the effort to get the deficit under control. I think it is if you have nondefense programs included in an across-the-board freeze.

Q. Where should the cuts come in the Pentagon budget?

A. My advice is to cut the number of weapons systems. We have, for example, three major nuclear-bomber programs—the B-1, the "stealth" and improvements in the older B-52s. We have the MX missile, the new small intercontinental ballistic missile and three different varieties of cruise missiles, in addition to two types of submarine-launched nuclear missiles. All of these are important individually, but collectively that's too much emphasis on the strategic nuclear arena. I would trim that down as well as trimming some conventional programs. If we continue to stretch the program, the per-unit cost will increase, and each defense dollar will be buying much less.

To make the most efficient use of our defense dollar, we also need to revise our military strategy. Defense Secretary Weinberger's definition of our military strategy—to fight as long as necessary, virtually everywhere in the world—is so broad that there's never going to be enough money in any year or any 10 years to implement it.

Q. How can this mismatch between strategy and resources be remedied?

A. Essentially, you have to identify your own assets and Soviet weaknesses. The assets of the Western world include access to oceans, stronger economies and superior technology. The Soviet Union, on the other hand, is surrounded by enemies on every side. They have profound weaknesses that we don't adequately gear our strategy toward. One is that they don't have very good access to the oceans. We can turn that to our advantage with better mine-laying capabilities to bottle up the Soviet fleet in wartime.

One of the biggest Soviet liabilities is that they have exposed lines of communications, with their forces stretched virtually halfway across the world. Their country is so huge that they have only two rail lines connecting their main industrial centers with the Chinese border, where about 30 percent of their military force is tied up. We should focus our conventional weapons on being able to interdict those lines of communications in the event they start a war.

Q. In the defense-budget battle, would you advise the President to regard the MX missile as expendable, particularly in view of mounting opposition from Republicans as well as Democrats?

A. I wouldn't give him that advice now. I think, though, that he ought to determine whether he's got any options to make the MX more survivable against a Soviet first strike. He ought to say: "It's been a long time since the 1980 campaign, and I ought to reassess my political pledge to the Western states to change the whole basing mode devised by the previous Pentagon." If he's still unwilling to reconsider his opposition to deceptive basing and mobility as key features of a basing mode, then he might as well accept that the MX is going to be killed by Congress.

Q. Will you continue to support the MX if the President is unable to come up with a more survivable basing mode?

A. I'm going to reserve judgment on it, but my support is getting very, very thin. I've been giving the administration time, hoping they'll come up with a combination of mobility, deception and hardening to make the missile more survivable. But if it becomes apparent that they're not going to change the basing mode, I will at some point vote "No" on the MX. I don't know whether it will be this spring or at some other time.

It's important, though, that we not make the MX decision in a vacuum and simply kill the MX program. We ought to look at our arms-control progress and our other land-based-missile options. For example, a lot of people are running around on Capitol Hill thinking that Midgetman, the mobile, single-warhead missile now being developed by the Air Force, is the answer to all our problems. But the single-warhead-missile deployment options become politically explosive unless we have an arms-control regime that limits the number of Soviet warheads.

If you can't limit the number of Soviet warheads, then you would have to plan to drive the mobile missiles off government land and onto public highways or rail lines. If you think the MX basing mode is controversial, wait until we tell people that we're going to have a nuclear-armed missile with several hundred security people and a long convoy of trucks running through their communities, either rural or urban.

Q. What other major defense issues should be addressed?

A. A major challenge for the President in the next four years is to reform the manpower system. I'm one of those who believe in the draft. We now have a system in which the sons of upper-middle-income and wealthy Americans no longer are participating in the defense of the nation. That's very unhealthy for a democracy over the long run. Over the next 20 to 30 years, we'll pay a huge price for that in terms of our political leadership understanding the military, in terms of having instincts about the real horrors of war. The people in this country who are deciding the questions of war and peace are usually upper-middle-income and wealthy people. And if it's lower-income America that is doing the dying, that raises basic questions of fairness and balanced judgments by decision makers in both Congress and the executive branch.

Secondly, in an age of technology we're going to have to develop a system to retain our military personnel with technical training in the service for longer careers. We have to modify the up-or-out system. After you train personnel in computer skills or in avionics repair, it doesn't make any sense to push them out simply because there's no room for them to move up to the next rank. We need to keep those people because we have a huge investment in them.

Q. In arms-control negotiations, should the President be willing to drop or modify his Star Wars program or suspend tests of the U.S. antisatellite system as a trade-off for concessions?

A. He ought to be willing to examine that possibility. But I don't think it ought to be done unilaterally. Both of these programs and the Pershing 2s are very much on the Soviets' minds. The Soviets have great fears about our technological capabilities. These are very large "bargaining chips."

So we need to be careful not to do things that reduce the value of our bargaining chips. For example, if you go beyond the brink in testing our antisatellite weapon or defensive systems, they would no longer be bargaining chips, because the Soviets at some point in the advanced stages of development will have to assume that the system has become a reality—that it is too late to stop it. In that case, we would have forfeited our leverage to persuade the Soviets to make large concessions, such as reducing their heavy land-based missiles. We may be in a period where there is a chance of tearing up America's defensive blueprints in exchange for reduction of presently deployed Soviet offensive weapons.

Q. What kind of arms-control agreement should be sought?

A. As a going-in position, I don't counsel any changes from the administration's current position as it has evolved on both medium-range missiles in Europe and intercontinental ballistic missiles. I am not in favor of up-front, unilateral concessions just to get the Soviets back to the bargaining table. That doesn't mean that our going-in position ought to be locked in concrete, however.

I think we have a window of opportunity for arms control now. But it's going to take an awful lot of high-level involvement, including the President himself. Somebody's got to bang heads and make decisions between the sincere but differing opinions of the State Department and the Defense Department. In order to react to the opportunity that I think is there for the next six months to a year, the President must get involved or get different people involved with cohesive instead of differing views.

I also believe more strongly than ever that we should place more emphasis on trying to negotiate a reasonable balance of conventional forces in Europe. The fact that our allied conventional forces, primarily our fighting equipment, in Europe are greatly outnumbered by the Soviets and have severe sustainability problems leads to a heavy reliance on the early use of nuclear weapons. There is an almost nonexistent time period between a brief conventional conflict and nuclear escalation. An agreement balancing the conventional forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the Warsaw Pact, thus lengthening that period, would reduce that danger.●

DECLINING U.S. COMPETITIVENESS

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, the release January 29 of productivity data for all of 1984 brings little cheer. Despite its usual cyclical spurt with the recovery, our international competitiveness has not been enhanced in recent years. Indeed, we are treading water at best in our effort to catch productivity levels abroad. Moreover, some evidence exists that we are lagging even further behind in that race. And the outlook is little better.

INTERNATIONAL COMPETITIVENESS

A slew of factors affect America's competitiveness—the ability of U.S. firms to seize and hold markets here and abroad. Perhaps the three most significant factors are foreign trade barriers to U.S. goods, foreign exchange rates, and relative productivity performance. I have recently discussed in detail, Mr. President, the need to adopt an aggressive trade policy designed to reduce trade barriers hobbling U.S. exports. Today, I will review how foreign exchange rates and our productivity performance are influencing our competitiveness.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE RATES

The adoption over a decade ago of free floating exchange rates was designed to ensure that all nations could easily balance their foreign trade and current accounts. We tried to put governments out of the currency manipulation market. And to a large degree that has occurred with the notable exception of Japan. Yet, this new exchange market freedom brought problems as well as benefits as the volume of international capital flows unrelated to merchandise trade has burgeoned. Today, these international currency flows, rather than underlying economic factors such as productivity, dominate exchange rate values.

The result has been the emergence of an international trading system heavily influenced by currency flows, not fundamental economic factors. Hand-in-glove has emerged a pervasive system of protectionism abroad which distorts trade flows even more.

Two good examples will clarify my point.

The United States incurred a $38 billion trade deficit with Japan in 1984. Typically, that would have sent the dollar plunging and the yen soaring in value as our importers scrambled for scarce yen to pay for those extra Japanese products. Yet, the yen did not rise in value last year. Its average in January 1985 was nearly identical to its January 1984 figure. Even the average yen value for the entire year 1984 was unchanged from 1983. Japanese Government intervention and Japanese investment flows to the United States prevented escalation in the yen. The result: The price of American products in Japan did not fall or sales rise as it typically would when such a surplus exists, denying us the additional jobs and profits associated with growing exports.

The second example involves U.S. trade with everyone—not just Japan. Last year, our trade deficit topped a legendary record $123 billion. And the deficit on current account hit 3 percent of GNP, twice the previous peak during the halycon days of the 1870's when foreign capital financed the railroad boom. Yet, the dollar actually strengthened rather than declined as it typically would have done. Indeed, over the last 4 years, the dollar has leaped 60 percent on a trade-weighted basis despite year after year of record trade deficits. The explanation rests with the hundreds of billions of foreign investment which has surged to our shores at the same time.

The fundamental cause of our incongruously rising dollar—the runaway budget deficits—is well known. Its impact is equally clear. It has hobbled exports and lured billions in underpriced foreign goods to our shores, cutting like a scythe through our foreign trade sector. That devastation has cost us millions of jobs. But because of the unique rule played by that sector in our Nation's productivity, it has longer term implications which warrant a closer look as well.

PRODUCTIVITY

Rising living standards rest squarely on a nation's ability to increase productivity. Its ability to compete abroad effectively, to pursue and expand foreign markets depends on it, as well. Indeed, productivity growth exceeding that abroad is a central component of any American strategy to enhance our competitiveness, and expand job opportunities.

By that criterion, the recovery is glossing over deeper and disturbing economic realities. The recovery is in its ninth quarter. And most signs suggest it has a good period still to run. The recovery has lifted real incomes. It has occurred without a resurgence of inflation. And it has finally reduced unemployment to the level we experienced when the Reagan administration took office.

In short, it has created some of the beneficial effects we have experienced in other postwar recoveries. Yet, it varies from those previous recoveries in a crucially important way: The present recovery was obtained in part by running a staggeringly large and unprecedented budget deficit.

These enormous deficits have given a distinct cast to the present recovery. It is the most unbalanced one in history, crippling our leading productivity sectors, like agriculture, and our vital foreign trade sector while other less productive but insulated sectors have prospered. As the first American recovery in history to rely largely on money borrowed from foreign creditors, the recovery has proceeded only at the expense of a sky-high dollar. And it has not produced the needed rebirth of productivity.

The recovery has created the usual cyclical increase in productivity. But that episodic increase has been low by historic standards. Productivity typically spurts in a passing fashion during a recovery as firms expand output without adding a commensurate number of employees. That occurred as expected in 1983 and 1984. Yet, the productivity growth we experienced was disappointing.

We have had seven postwar recoveries of substantial duration—beginning in 1949, 1954, 1958, 1961, 1970, 1975, and 1983. During the first four quarters of these recoveries, nonfarm business sector productivity growth averaged 5.3 percent. It grew only 3.9 percent during the comparable period this time, according to the Wall Street brokerage house of Goldman Sachs. That is the second weakest productivity recovery in the postwar period—an also-ran sixth of seven recoveries. I have a table, Mr. President, containing this data in detail, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The table follows:

TABLE I.—Productivity [1]

Recovery trough:	Percent [2]
1949:VI	7.5
1954:II	5.0
1958:II	4.9
1961:I	3.8
1970:VI	5.1
1975:I	5.3
1982:VI	3.9

Source: Goldman Sachs.

Mr. BENTSEN. Some argue that fundamental factors like altered labor force composition make comparison of productivity growth during recent recoveries with older recoveries inappropriate. But adjusting for that notion leaves the story unchanged. For example, during the first four quarters of the most recent 1975 recovery, productivity rose 5.1 percent—still well above the 3.9 percent during this recovery's comparable period.

Productivity growth during this recovery's second four quarters slumped to an average 2.3 percent, more in line with historical averages. Yet, even here a closer examination of 1984 is disheartening. Productivity growth plummeted to a scant 0.4 percent in the last half of the year from a respectable 4.2 percent the first 6 months.

In short, cyclical productivity growth during the recovery has lagged behind historical experience. It has slumped markedly already from its recovery peak. There is no evidence that it will regain the robust 3-plus-percent growth rate achieved in the 1950's and 1960's. There is no evidence that it will regain longer term historical U.S. average of some 2.5 percent. Nor is there evidence that its future trend will even exceed the grim record posted during much of the 1970's. If so, future real growth prospects will be capped at 3 percent or less, not the 4 or 5 percent bandied about so freely today.

The explanation for this lagging productivity recovery is straightforward. The imbalanced recovery has crippled the two sectors—manufacturing and agriculture—which traditionally lead U.S. productivity growth. They historically have been the engines of America's productivity growth. Over the last decade, for example, manufacturing productivity has risen 1.8 percent a year—twice as fast as U.S. productivity generally. And farm productivity has risen an even faster 2.1 percent a year. Yet, these key sectors have not even pulled out of the deep 1981 recession. Moreover, the service sector most favored by this recovery is a drag on productivity. Productivity in services has grown at a bare fourtenths of 1 percent over the last decade, less than half the national average.

INTERNATIONAL PRODUCTIVITY PERFORMANCE

The dollar's scouring of American agriculture and manufacturing has dashed hopes for the moment of meeting the challenge posed by increasingly productive foreign producers. From 1981 to 1983, for example, with our best players benched, U.S. productivity growth was near the bottom internationally. It was the same familiar story. Productivity in Japan, Belgium, and France grew at least twice as fast as U.S. productivity, and productivity in Germany, the United Kingdom, and the Netherlands, grew well over three times faster.

Foreign data for 1984 from the Bureau of Labor Statistics is still coming in. But this last year was very likely no better. U.S. productivity growth in 1984 ran 10 percent below 1983. At the same time, growth in the EC nations picked up, which inevitably means higher productivity abroad.

Much has been made of the "lean, mean" U.S. manufacturing sector alleged to be rising like a phoenix from the present crisis. Don't bet on it. In 1982, U.S. manufacturing productivity grew less than in Japan, Belgium, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Sweden or the United Kingdom. The performance was worse in 1983 when 9 of the 11 other large industrial economies enjoyed higher productivity growth in manufacturing. And U.S. manufacturing productivity in 1984 was little improved over the also-ran 1983 performance.

REGAINING U.S. COMPETITIVENESS

Taken together, the recession and recovery have markedly diminished U.S. competitiveness in world markets. We are being outpriced and outpaced in productivity growth by our competitors. U.S. exports of most goods are no higher today than in 1981, while exports from elsewhere have blossomed. The United States has been left in the dust of our trade competitors grabbing new markets abroad. Even here at home, market shares retained by domestic firms are ebbing under the assault of lower priced imports. Capital goods, machine tools, office equipment and others—the import inroads are stark and rising. Most severely endangered are our smokestack industries. Yet, major battles are being fought over domestic high tech markets long considered impervious to foreign challenge. U.S. computer exports, for example, rose 20 percent last year. Yet, imports soared 58 percent.

Hopes for improving U.S. competitiveness in world markets rest squarely on hiking up our longer term productivity trend and stabilizing the dollar. Both are fundamental factors influencing our market shares abroad. And both are important.

They may be equally intransigent, as well. The budget deficit has jacked up the longer term level of U.S. interest rates as much as 400 basis points—making it difficult to predict when the dollar will subside on foreign exchange markets. The only certain answer is to reduce the deficit.

Similarly, the sorry trend of productivity growth here compared to that abroad is not readily rectified. It could be resolved by a lower dollar. But other answers are not so simple. The process of sparking productivity growth is still not well understood. And a period of national introspection may be needed to explore why U.S. productivity remains an international laggard despite the recovery.●

CHILD CARE CENTER AT NYLONCRAFT, INC.

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I would like to share with all of my colleagues an article found in a recent issue of Nyl;oncraft Inc. magazine, that discusses the child care center developed by Nyloncraft, of Mishawaka, IN. This Indiana plastics company found that the introduction of Nyloncraft Learning Center, a 24-hour-a-day quality day-care center, not only helped solve the company's previously high rate of absenteeism and employee turnover, but it has enhanced Nyloncraft's business image as well. The establishment of the day-care center has given Nyloncraft the reputation of a progressive, people-oriented company to employees and customers alike. Nyloncraft is representative of the innovative management and skilled work force of corporations found in the fastest growing State in the Midwest.

I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THE KIDS ARE ALL RIGHT

(By Donna Fenn)

No company in Indiana had ever tried it, state regulations nearly prevented it from seeing the light of day, and it was a guaranteed money-loser. But Nyloncraft Inc., in Mishawaka, Ind., had surveyed its employees and found that child-care problems were at the root of the high absenteeism and turnover rates plaguing the company in the late 1970s. So in June 1981, the plastics-molding company opened Indiana's first 24-hour day-care facility.

That was not an easy accomplishment, but it is one of many steps that Nyloncraft has taken in recent years to put the company among the industry's top performers. A few years earlier, Nyloncraft's president, Jim Wyllie, had brought in two managers, Bob Tennyson and Ken Harkleroad, to help him turn around his family-owned business. The last thing the three wanted was to have absenteeism and turnover among plant workers undermine what they had worked so hard to build up. "I'm not for taking care of people from birth to the grave," says Tennyson, the tall, ruddy-faced, 37-year-old vice-president of finance. "I like people to take care of themselves. This, though, was important for our business. It was really an effort we made to take care of Nyloncraft."

"We were an employer of about 250 people, and at the end of 1978 we wrote 900-plus W2s, which means we turned every job in the plant over three times," Tennyson continues. "The real, significant cost is in the loss of productivity that takes place in the plant. You're probably talking $1,500 to $2,000 [in training costs per employee]. . . . The potential costs are astronomical." Last year, Nyloncraft wrote only 26 more W2s than there were jobs; and absenteeism had dropped to less than 3%.

Today, Tennyson is quick to sing the day-care center's praises, but that wasn't always the case. "Initially, I was not a proponent of the learning center. I thought it was too early in this corporation's life cycle to begin to look at things like that. Just trying to get myself converted from machine-hour rates to kid-hour rates was a chore in itself. Now I am probably the learning center's biggest fan, and I'm the person who is most critical of anything that costs money around here."

If Tennyson was the skeptic, 45-year-old Harkleroad, executive vice-president and self-described "in-house liberal," was the advocate. "I felt sorry for a lot of the women," Harkleroad says, adding that 85% of Nyloncraft's 450 employees are women, many of them single parents with young children. "I spent a lot of time out on the floor talking to them about their problems, and there was a constant worry about children." Between the employee survey and Harkleroad's lobbying, Tennyson and Wyllie were persuaded that some sort of day-care arrangement might make good business sense.

First, Nyloncraft considered subsidizing outside child care, either through a voucher system or by contract with a local day-care chain. But, says Suzanne Colley, the 37-year-old consultant for the project and current director of the center, the company decided against these possibilities because "it wasn't that employees didn't have the money to pay for day care—it was that they couldn't find reliable care." She adds that Wyllie "wanted the day care to be something [the company] could really monitor and control. They didn't want any excuses from employees about why they weren't using it."

Once the three top managers had made a commitment to an on-site center, Ken Harkleroad went on the road to look at other companies with successful day-care centers. "In our ignorance," he recalls wryly, "we thought there was nothing more to this than padding a room and putting kids in it." But after his trip, he knew that Nyloncraft had underestimated not only the work to be done, but the benefits that a day-care center could bring to the company. If they went about it in the right way, the center could do more than just alleviate child-care worries: It could make Nyloncraft workers much more committed to the company.

While the advantages of an on-site day-care center were becoming pretty clear by then, the headaches were not so immediately visible. Nyloncraft's management team soon learned, however, that there are good reasons why so few companies choose to open their own centers. As Jim Wyllie, 44, says in retrospect, "I don't understand how anybody can make money in [the child-care] industry, but I suspect it's because a lot of people don't go by the rules."

Nyloncraft was faced with a special problem. The company's three Indiana molding plants, two in Mishawaka and one in nearby South Bend, run 2 hours a day, and many of the younger women, who don't have seniority, work the night shifts. If the day-care was going to help eliminate high turnover and absenteeism among workers with young children, it, too, would have to run 24 hours a day. But state regulations applied only to centers open the usual 8 hours, and included such rules as the one that forbids cleaning while children are on the premises—not an easy requirement to meet for a center that is open night and day.

Leaning across his desk, his face reddening with exasperation, Wyllie describes his first contact with the Indiana State Department of Public Welfare—the licensing body for day-care centers in Indiana. "Their response was to send some little guy with an earring up here on a motorcycle who started telling me I can't do this because his regulations don't allow it." Finally, Wyllie says, "I told him, 'You are a bureaucrat. You don't make law, you enforce it. And since there are no 24-hour child-care facilities in this state, there is no law to cover it. We're going to put the center up, we're going to run it the best we see fit, and if you have a problem with what we're doing, sue us.' " Wyllie took his battle with the Welfare Department to then-Governor Otis Bowen. "All our problems went away," he says—with the Welfare Department, at least. Still to come were fire, health, and sanitation regulations, as well as certification requirements from the state's Department of Public Instruction for the preschool and kindergarten programs. Persistence paid off, though, and by June 1981, the Nyloncraft Learning Center (NLC), a wholly owned subsidiary of Nyloncraft, opened its doors.

In 1983, Nyloncraft built a new plant in Mishawaka—including a quarter-million-dollar, 6,600-square-foot learning center 10 feet down the hall from Wyllie's office. It enrolls preschoolers mostly, but is set up for after-school use as well, and is open to the community. The company pays about half of the $50-a-week tuition for its employees, gives free care to those who work overtime, and runs a van to shuttle the children back and forth between plants and to pick children up from school and bring them to the center. Enrollment is now at 160, with employees' children making up about a third of the 2-to-13-year-olds who attend. Wyllie estimates that 75% of the Nyloncraft parents who could use the facility do. When asked about the difference between his world of annual reports and humming machinery and the roomful of finger paintings and 2-year-olds singing "Itsy-Bitsy Spider" down the hall, Wyllie smiles and shakes his head. No, he says, it's not so different—"just another good business decision."

The center is run by a 27-member staff, including six certified teachers. And, as is often the case, teachers' wages are low—starting at $4.25 an hour—and turnover is high. That puts NLC director Colley in a bit of a bind: She is determined to maintain a high-quality learning environment but, at the same time, is committed to making the center break even within the next few years. As for any immediate jeopardy posed by the $20,000 annual operating loss, however, Wyllie says without hesitation, "I'd never consider shutting it down."

The same direct, sometimes paternalistic, approach is a Wyllie hallmark in his relationships with employees. "I negotiate our union contracts," he says with pride. "My attitude is that if I don't have the guts or show them the respect to sit down with them and talk to them, then I shouldn't be where I am." There are about 6,000 thermoplastic injection molding companies in the country, he says, 30 of which are in the South Bend/Mishawaka area. And he is the first to admit that "the only difference between us and every other injection-molding firm is the people."

Every Mother's Day, Wyllie dons a white tuxedo, top hat, and cane, and presents corsages to all the women in the plant. He throws a company picnic that could rival any county fair; a recent one was a three-day-long event that included a bluegrass music festival, elephant and helicopter rides, and seemingly endless kegs of beer. A couple of years ago, at a general meeting where Christmas bonuses were distributed, employees surprised him with a "strip-o-gram." "To me, that's a sign of respect—for them to know that I can take a joke that well," says Wyllie. The people, he says, were his father's priority when he started Nyloncraft 28 years ago.

Wyllie worked for his father during the summers, and says he never had any intention of succeeding him as president of Nyloncraft. But after a business failure of his own and a disappointing career at the accounting firm of Ernst & Ernst, he joined Nyloncraft in 1966, three years after his father's death. His uncle, Robert Wyllie, a retired Army lieutenant-colonel, was president of the company at the time.

"I spent the first year and a half out in the shop working in every department doing every job," he says. "There are a couple of press operator records out there that I still hold." Two years later, Wyllie became sales manager, and sales increased from $1.5 million in 1968 to $7 million in 1977. Even so, the company was in bad shape financially. "It was just not making money, and it had a lot of problems," says Wyllie. "My uncle and I didn't philosophically see eye to eye." So Wyllie and his two sisters, each of whom owned 25% of the company, bought out Robert Wyllie, and Jim Wyllie became president of Nyloncraft.

Wyllie knew he would need help to implement his reorganization plan, a plan his uncle had told him was "garbage," so he brought in Harkleroad, a vendor for Eastman Chemical Products Inc., who frequently called on Nyloncraft, and Tennyson, Wyllie's former student at Indiana University at South Bend, where he once taught business at night school. "There were five years of 12- and 15-hour days," says Harkleroad, "but we brought a level of sophistication to the company that really positioned us for growth."

Those long hours were spent reducing the number of presses, changing the layout of the plant, and carefully placing employees in the jobs for which they were best suited. Today, 50% of Nyloncraft's salaried staff has come from the ranks of hourly employees. "We had some good people but they were in the wrong jobs doing the wrong things, so I changed them all around," Wyllie says.

The one exception is Bettie La Salle, a tall, slender woman with a midwestern drawl, who has been with the company for 25 years. Wyllie's father asked her to become Nyloncraft's first personnel manager after observing her rapport with fellow plant workers, and she has held that job ever since. It is a position that Nyloncraft holds in high esteem. Before Wyllie began building the new plant, he encouraged all employees to think about—and then pass on to him—any design ideas they had that would make Nyloncraft a better place to work. One suggestion came up time and time again: the wish to be able to meet with La Salle without other managers knowing about it. And Wyllie acted on that wish. He not only built La Salle's office with a separate entrance that opens directly onto the plant, he also gave her an adjoining conference room and more space than anyone else in the company.

As the link between plant workers and management, La Salle is Nyloncraft's "Dear Abby." "I have listened to everything from incest to child abuse to money problems." But, she says, the frequency with which employees come to her with child-care problems has been reduced drastically since Nyloncraft opened the learning center. La Salle adds that the center is also a great hiring tool. "People know this is a progressive company because the president feels so strongly about the center. They enjoy working for a company that really cares about its people. That, in effect, has made my job easier."

That was what NLC was supposed to do—reduce absenteeism and turnover, improve morale, and serve as a recruiting tool. But on occasion, NLC's benefits have surprised even its founders. "When the learning center opened, it changed our way of operating," says Tennyson, recalling NLC's part in making the new plant a reality. Wyllie had bought the property for a song at public auction. The hitch was that it was adjacent to a shopping center and was not zoned for manufacturing. Another prospective buyer, who had been outbid by Wyllie, urged the city council to keep the zoning commercial. Six months of hearings followed. The clincher was a visit made to the plant and learning center by some members of the council and zoning commission. In the end, says Wyllie, "we never had a dissenting vote, and the first thing that virtually every one of those bodies talked about was the child-care facility."

NLC also has influenced Nyloncraft's customers. "We use it as a sales tool," says Wyllie. "It wasn't intended, but you bring somebody to the learning center and their whole attitude toward us is, if this company is this progressive, then they must be somebody I want to do business with." Tom Murphy, vice-president of manufacturing at Fellowes Manufacturing Co., in Itasca, Ill., confirms that impression. He says he probably would have given Nyloncraft his business in any case, but that "the day-care center is an added kicker to the opinion you would form anyway. I think I was probably more impressed with the day-care center than I was with the plant—and it's a great plant." Milt Bukes, purchasing agent at Ford Motor Co.'s Transmission and Chassis Component Purchasing division, in Dearborn, Mich., agrees. "The bottom line is that any company that cares about their people like that has got to be one hell of a company," he says, adding that Nyloncraft's low employee turnover has to result in more consistent production quality—a factor important to Ford when it evaluates its suppliers. That was underscored last October, when Ford presented Nyloncraft with its Q-1 Preferred Quality Award for outstanding performance.

While the learning center is only one of many innovations at Nyloncraft responsible for the company's success—revenues in 1984 were about $25 million—its part in the process makes its operating in the red a bit easier to take. Still, Wyllie hasn't given up on making NLC profitable. He has been pitching the learning center to other local businesses, trying to convince them to subsidize day care for their employees at Nyloncraft. His efforts, he said in frustration at a recent monthly meeting of the steering committee that oversees NLC, have been unsuccessful—other employers are too bottom-line oriented to understand that day care can make good business sense. The committee, including Wyllie, Colley, La Salle, and manager of manufacturing services David Martinez, meets over lunch at The Blue Lantern, a local restaurant. Seated at a large round table in the back, they joke with one another good-naturedly. But when the meeting starts, the note pads come out, minutes are taken, and motions are made. The conversation rambles from who will fix the school van to how much money the center is losing. But the focus of this meeting is to come up with plans that will help Colley fulfill one of her original commitments to Nyloncraft—to have the center breaking even in three to five years. Although the $20,000 to $25,000 operating loss and the $25,000 to $30,000 typically spent on employee subsidies each year are tax deductible, the company's best-case scenario is to eliminate the loss altogether.

Colley asks Wyllie for an update on another project—a plan to cut costs internally by expanding the use of the center's kitchen, which serves three hot meals and six snacks a day to the children. "Generally, food service is a loser, but in this case, maybe we can make a buck," says Wyllie of the idea to begin preparing food to sell to employees. "We'll shoot for trying to get it started in the fall." One idea that has come up earlier is discussed again: What about doing another television commercial, this time honing in on the center's nighttime care? (Commercials already appear on two cable television stations, CNN and ESPN.) "We can have 92 kids every eight hours," says Wyllie. "We're full on days, but we've got to fill up the night shift. The problem is revenues, but if we get the volume up, that'll take care of itself."

Colley suggests that they make presentations on the center to realtors as one more way to let area newcomers know about NLC. The realtors, in fact, might want to suggest to potential clients that they drop their children off before they begin their house-hunting treks. "If we start small with that select group, then maybe we could see how a drop-in center would do and build up from there," she says. Martinez doubts that this will be a money-maker, but, he muses, the exposure to new families might make it a worthwhile effort. The meeting concludes with a look at NLC's balance sheet. "I love it," Colley says with a giggle. "My year-to-date favorable is $5. I'm ready to go out and spend it!" "Don't spend it all in one place," La Salle advises.

PARENTS WHO WORRY LESS WORK MORE

Not every company has the time, interest, or resources to get into the child-care business. Still, a recent study by the National Employer Supported Child Care Project, in Pasadena, Calif., revealed that the number of companies with child-care programs had increased by almost 400% from 1978 to 1982. The study refers to a poll of corporate human resources executives, 67% of whom reported that their companies expected to provide child-care benefits within five years.

Prohibitive up-front and operating costs, coupled with a fair amount of red tape, are what discourage most smaller companies like Nyloncraft from setting up their own centers. But current federal tax laws make some type of employer-support day care—such as information and referral services, voucher programs, or flexible benefits—a reasonable goal for many companies. Child-care expenditures, including referral contracts and subsidies to parents and providers, as well as the cost of operating a center, are all tax-deductible. Under a Dependent Care Assistance Program, employers may also offer child care as a tax-free benefit to their employees. Several smaller companies have found creative ways to put these new laws to work to help solve their employees' child-care problems.

Endless Vacation Inc. (#389 on the 1984 INC. 500 list of the faster-growing private companies in America) wasn't ready for an onsite center but needed to do something about child care for its 430 employees. "Several staff members came forward and said they would feel less stress and perform better if they had child care," says executive vice-president Christel DeHaan. So last May, the Indianaplis-based vacation time-sharing company signed a contract with Kinder-Care Learning Centers Inc., the Goliath of day-care chains. The arrangement gives Endless Vacation's employees a 20% discount. (10% from the company and 10% from Kinder-Care) on child care at a nearby Kinder-Care center. DeHaan says the subsidized day care has reduced absenteeism and turnover.

Squirt & Co., a Holland, Mich., soft-drink bottler and franchisor of bottling rights, chose a different solution to the same problems. "We were finding that our employees were very much concerned with child care, and these concerns reflected themselves in productivity and training costs," says

Dennis Eade, vice-president of human resources. Eade also noted that "the shrinking of federal money for day care" was crippling Community Coordinated Child Care (4C), Holland's primary source for information and referral on child care. Squirt and two other Holland-based companies met with the director of the local 4C and suggested forming a consortium of companies that would pay membership fees in exchange for child-care assistance. The consortium now has 12 companies, half of which are under $100 million in sales. Each company pays an annual fee (which is tax deductible as either a charitable contribution or a business expense) based on the number of people it employs. While Squirt doesn't offer its employees financial assistance for day care, the contract with 4C includes matching children with the type of care parents request, parent counseling, educational programs for day-care providers, and on-site inspection of all facilities. "It's an extremely cost-effective and beneficial arrangement," says Eade. "If they placed one child of one employee, then Squirt would have gotten the cost of the service back." Squirt has recouped the cost several times over through reduced turnover rates.

Several companies in the Prospect Hill Executive Office Park, in Waltham, Mass., also found child care more attractive when the expense—and the risk—was shared. They recently joined forces to support an onsite resource center that includes a library, a referral system for securing child care, lunchtime seminars for parents, and, in the near future, on-site day care and a special after-school call-in system for employees' children. According to Joan Bergstrom, a consultant from Wheelock College who designed the Prospect Hill Parents' and Children's Center, "Small companies came to the president of the park and said that since, individually, they were small companies, it made sense for them to come together." Bergstrom says some of the companies were losing key employees due to lack of child care. "We are a company that is highly dependent on attracting the best type of employee," says Townsend Hornor, director of corporate development at Henco Software Inc., one of four companies supporting the center. "We think that a day-care center located around this park will be a considerable asset in the future."

Institute for Scientific Information (ISI), a Philadelphia database publisher, is another company whose decision to assist employees with day care was future-oriented. While ISI has an on-site center, buit in 1982 as part of the company's new corporate headquarters, only 11% of the available slots are filled by ISI children—the rest are from the surrounding community. Although the center was not built in response to current needs within the company, says Peter Aborn, senior vice-president, "it will be a necessity in 5 or 10 years for competing for the services of working parents." ISI also gives its employees the option of cashing in all but one week of their vacation and sick leave and putting it toward child care on a pretax basis. This "flexible benefit" can be applied toward ISI's center, or one of the parent's choosing. Aborn estimates ISI loses about $200,000 a year, before taxes, on the center, but views this expense as "an investment in our future."●

DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN ON "THE IRISH AMONG US"

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in anticipation of the centennial of the Statue of Liberty in 1986, the Reader's Digest has initiated a series of essays on our Nation's immigrant history. The first article in the series, which appears in the current issue, is an eloquent and perceptive analysis of America's Irish heritage by our Irish-American colleague from New York, Senator DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN.

As Senator MOYNIHAN states in "The Irish Among Us," no immigrant group in our history deserves more credit for making it respectable to be ethnic than the Irish Americans. From their earliest arrival in the United States, the Irish have added character, energy, and achievement to all facets of American life.

Through perseverance and faith, humor and hard work, courage and patriotism, often against the odds, they won acceptance for themselves and consequently for all ethnic groups in the United States. As Senator MOYNIHAN makes clear, "In the end, this may be judged the great and indispensable achievement of the Irish. They made it American to be ethnic."

Mr. President, I ask that Senator MOYNIHAN's entertaining and insightful article may be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From Reader's Digest, January 1985]

The Peoples of America

Who are the peoples of America? We are only one people, most would answer—different groups melted together. Yet not quite together. In "Beyond the Melting Pot," Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan suggested that the pot does not truly "melt"—that ethnic diversity remains strong within a framework of unity. This diversity has produced an exotic new people, with each group contributing something unique to the overall mix, yet each retaining something of its original heritage. And the process continues today.

With the centenary of the Statue of Liberty approaching in 1986, Reader's Digest has asked several outstanding Americans, each from a different ethnic tradition, to write about their heritage and its unique contributions to the American whole. Called "The Peoples of America," the series begins with Senator Moynihan's essay on the Irish—the people, who, in his words, "made it American to be ethnic."

THE IRISH AMONG US

(By Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan)

Ronald Reagan hails, on his father's side, from Ballyporeen in County Tipperary and grew up with the nickname "Dutch." Which suggests that in Tampico, Ill., ethnic identities had gotten a bit blurred by then. Even so, he is a man very much aware of his Irish origins, and as President he has not let a St. Patrick's Day go by uncelebrated.

The fading of the old ties and their continuing tug—both phenomena are true, especially of the Irish. It may even be said to have started with them.

Some say it was the Irish who discovered North America, albeit the Indians have a good case to the contrary. But as Europeans they were present, you might say, at the creation. Of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, two were born in England, but three in Ireland, and of those born here, Irish ancestry was common. St. Patrick's Day was properly celebrated at Valley Forge in 1778, at which time St. Patrick's Day festivities were already a generation old in New York City.

From the first, the Irish presence in America has reflected the complex history of the British Isles. The English invaded Ireland in 1170 and settled around Dublin in an area that came to be known as the Pale (in reference to the extent of English rule). Beyond the Pale, the Celtic Irish continued to plunder one another. The "English"—Butlers and Burkes and suchlike—soon became more Irish than the Irish. Thus they generally opposed the now Protestant English, who invaded again under Elizabeth I and then under Cromwell—who in turn brought over a large number of Scots who settled in Ulster.

Members of all three groups migrated to America, but at different times. First came the Anglo-Irish, Anglican in the main. Next, the Scots-Irish, in the main Presbyterian. And finally, during the great famine migrations of the 1840s, the Catholic Irish.

At first America changed them all; then they changed America. No group was so transformed by the Revolution. One Irish historian wrote: "Before 1776, Irish Catholics in the colonies were a servant class of a widely proscribed religion. Presbyterians were a secondary caste, tolerated, but widely disliked." The central assertion of the Declaration of Independence—that all men are created equal—changed the status of Presbyterian and Catholic Irish alike as centuries of bloodshed on their island had never done.

First Foreigners

The first great political change in the new nation that we might think of as ethnic was the rise of the Scots-Irish, symbolized by the Presidency of Andrew Jackson (his mother had left Ulster two years before his birth). In Jackson's time, the Scots-Irish were seen as frontiersmen, and achieving the Presidency was the first democratic triumph of American politics. Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe were aristocrats. The tale is still told that at Jackson's inaugural bash the only way the mob could be lured from the White House was by moving the tubs of punch out onto the lawn.

The Ulster folk may have worn coonskin caps, but at least they were Protestant, a branch of the family. With the arrival in the 1840s of large numbers of Catholic Irish, America suddenly became a nation of immigrations. Nothing before had so threatened the essential Englishness of our society. And the heart of it was religion, which Americans then considered the foundation of our political institutions. Great battles for North America had raged between the English and the Catholic powers of Spain and France; the English saw this as a contest between the forces of liberty and those of tyranny. As Thomas Jefferson wrote in 1813: "History furnishes no example of a priest-ridden people maintaining a free civil government."

And then, a generation later, came the Catholic Irish—not only papish but poor. Not only poor—Franklin had been poor—but with poor prospects. They had been living on potatoes for two generations, and had lost the most elemental of skills. (The memory of how to make bread had all but disappeared from western Ireland.) Probably not more than half of the immigrants from this part of Ireland even spoke English, much less could they behave as Englishmen.

In a word, they were our first foreigners, the first perceived internal threat to the American way of life.

But the famine Irish proved that American institutions could accommodate a great diversity of peoples, with no loss of character. We thus became a community of belief that far transcended religion, race or nationality.

Yankee Doodle

What did the Irish do? First, they stayed in the cities, remaining highly visible. Next, they kept to their faith. Thus the Roman Catholic Church became a major American institution. Then they went into politics. Whereupon that most honorable of callings, as the Founders understood it, began to lose its reputation. It seems that owning slaves was quite acceptable, but owning a saloon . . . well!

The Irish took it cheerfully. Literally. Instead of letting others define them, they chose to define themselves. They asserted that far from being a threat to the republic, they were a welcome addition to its strength and a rather much-needed increment to its gaiety.

For on to a thousand years they had been about as luckless a people as were to be found in Europe. Yet soon Americans were talking about the luck of the Irish. Above all, they celebrated the luck of being in America. The story was told in the 1840's of the newcomer on a ferry crossing New York harbor early one evening when a cannon at the Battery let off a great boom. "What was that?" he asked a fellow passenger. "The sun going down," was the reply. "Wisha," said the Kerryman, "it never went down like that in the old country."

A dour people of the Celtic fringe, they took to the music halls, telling one and all what delightful folk they were. And to the prize ring and the baseball diamond. The ethnic story appeared: "Pat and Mike." Dumb but endearing.

Above all they took to the colors. It was while watching the slaughter at Fredericksburg, in which the Irish Brigade played a prominent part, that Gen. Robert E. Lee remarked, "It is well that war is so terrible, or we should grow too fond of it." By this time the Irish were rather conspicuous in military matters, a tradition culminating, perhaps, in William J. "Wild Bill" Donovan's command of the 69th Infantry (the "Fighting Irish") in France in World War I.

An Irish-American culture emerged. Henry James, one of our greatest novelists, was pure Celt. But the more assertively Irish were in their taste assertively popular. Edward Harrigan transformed the American stage with rollicking performances no longer burlesque, but not yet musical comedy, and none too gentle with the genteel. George M. Cohan brought patriotism to Broadway: "I'm a Yankee Doodle Dandy," he sang, "born on the Fourth of July." (He was!)

Luck of the Irish

Even though the newcomers were patriotic, the doubting went on. The American Party, called the "Know-Nothings" because at first its secret members disclaimed any knowledge of it, advocated government by native citizens and fostered a vicious anti-Catholicism in the 1850s. In 1887 an Iowa lawyer, Henry F. Bowers, founded the American Protective Association, a secret society whose members took oaths not to vote for or hire Catholics.

After the Civil War the Ku Klux Klan—anti-Catholic and anti-Semitic as well as anti-black—had spread across the nation. By the 1920s, Klan members controlled the Oregon state legislature, and voters in that state took aim at Catholics by passing a law that prohibited private and parochial schools. The U.S. Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional. But anxieties lingered, and in 1947 the Court began limiting the kinds of aid that could be provided to parochial schools.

Some years ago Nathan Glazer and I, in our book "Beyond the Melting Pot," suggested that there were two models of immigrant experience: groups whose members do well from the first, like the American Chinese (three generations, you might say, from Canton to Stanford), and those for whom it is an up and down experience. This was the experience of the Catholic Irish. For generations they produced, along with the most respectable of persons, the most disrespectable. In the 1938 Hollywood movie "Angels With Dirty Faces," Pat O'Brien and Jimmy Cagney played two boys who come out of the slums together, one to go to the priesthood, the other to the electric chair, and all by chance. In their first escapade, O'Brien got over the fence ahead of the cops, Cagney didn't. In the final scene, returned to his parish in the old neighborhood, O'Brien asks a group of urchins to pray for a boy who couldn't run as fast as he could.

Looking back, it seems something was always chasing the Irish. But their luck held, not least, I have suspected, because they settled first in the industrial North and Middle West, which prospered. In a surprising study entitled "Ethnicity, Denomination and Inequality," published in 1976, Andrew Greeley of the University of Chicago found that, among white American gentiles, Irish Catholics ranked first in years of education, second (after British Protestants) in occupational prestige and first again in family income. (The Protestant Scots-Irish, who settled in poorer places like Appalachia, ranked lower in all three.)

Indispensable Achievement

With the 20th century, there were just too many Irish in too many places to speak of special characteristics. And now the religious issue began to fade too. In 1928, a Catholic ran for President. He didn't win, but Al Smith took it with usual good nature. The story goes he sent the pope a one word cable: "Unpack."

Thirty-two years later another Catholic, John F. Kennedy, ran for President and won. The long struggle of the Catholic Irish was over. As for the Scots-Irish, more than a dozen of the 40 Presidents to date are recorded as Scots-Irish in whole or part. Altogether, it comes to a third of the Presidents, and rather more of them of late.

And why not? To be Irish is now an American thing, and all things considered rather a friendly statement. In the end this may be judged the great and indispensable achievement of the Irish. They made it American to be ethnic.

This was strikingly demonstrated in the census of 1980, which for the first time collected ethnic data on persons regardless of the number of generations removed from their country of origin. The results were astonishing. Not the rank order. That could have been predicted: English (50 million), German (49 million), Irish (40 million), Afro-American (21 million), French (13 million), Italian (12 million). The surprise was not the size if the groups, it was that almost everybody—83 percent of the American population—could and would identify their ancestry.

Why was it indispensable that we should come to accept one another in these terms? Because the "melting pot" wasn't going to happen, and immigration was. Unless it became perfectly acceptable to be American and Syrian—or Japanese or Jamaican—the task of government to "ensure domestic tranquility" would have become nigh impossible.

But "ethnicity" did become acceptable, and for that we can thank the Irish among us.●

THE PRESIDENT'S TASK FORCE ON INTERNATIONAL PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the President's Task Force on International Private Enterprise, chaired by Dwayne O. Andreas, chief executive officer of Archer Daniels Midland, was asked to identify ways to strengthen the economies of developing nations and how U.S. foreign assistance could be used to stimulate private enterprise development in these nations.

The task force report concisely and accurately describes the well-coordinated, aggressive funding efforts used by most of our industrial nation competitors to induce Third World buyers to purchase from their exporters. U.S. exporters are frequently the victims of these credit schemes, since they are unable to match the concessional financing terms available from these nations.

In November 1983, Congress emphasized its mandate to the Eximbank to provide export financing that is fully competitive with that offered by other countries and to be more aggressive in meeting unfair financing competition.

Briefly, the findings of the task force show that the United States and its exporters are losing markets to countries that provide concessional credit; that past U.S. Government actions have been limited and ineffective; that the U.S. posture on mixed credits is not likely to be successful in the foreseeable future; and that a new approach is needed to support U.S. exporters and permit them to compete on equal terms with other exporters.

Based on these findings, the President's task force recommends that the United States give highest priority to negotiations directed at stopping the practice of governments using subsidized financing for the purpose of commercial advantage. The United States should discourage the use of mixed credits and other forms of subsidized financing and convince U.S. competitors that it is better to rely on market forces to increase trade and achieve prosperity.

In order to neutralize the predatory financing used by competitors the United States should fund an aggressive problem of official export financing. Such a program should remain in effect until our competitors discontinue their mixed credit programs.

Mr. President, the report of the President's Task Force on International Private Enterprise will be very helpful in our consideration of the Eximbank. I therefore ask that it be printed in the RECORD in its entirety.

The report follows:

MIXED CREDITS ACTION BRIEF—THE PRESIDENT'S TASK FORCE ON INTERNATIONAL PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

In May 1983, at a time of severe international economic turbulence, the President established the President's Task Force on International Private Enterprise. The President requested that the Task Force identify ways to strengthen the economies of developing nations. In particular, the President asked the Task Force how U.S. foreign assistance could be used to stimulate private enterprise development and promote investment in and trade with developing countries.

In our report to the President, we proposed a number of specific program and organizational changes. We have tried to be diligent in finding the best means to translate policy into action. To this end, we have prepared the following "action brief" that elaborates on a major recommendation of the Task Force, countering mixed credits and other predatory trade practices.

The United States must strengthen its position in negotiations to end unfair trade finance competition. The Export-Import Bank should operate up to its $4 billion lending authority and $10 billion guarantee authority to counter predatory trade practices and provide equivalent support to U.S. exporters.

MIXED CREDITS: INTRODUCTION

Exports are increasingly important to the United States economy. One tenth of our national income stems from trade; 20 percent of our work force depends on trade for its livelihood. Forty percent of our agricultural production is sold abroad; one third of our corporate profits are generated by international operations.

Every major trading country except the United States has undertaken serious efforts to achieve international competitive dominance in one or more industrial export sectors. These efforts are also evident in the agricultural sector, an increasingly important segment of U.S. trade. U.S. markets at home and abroad have been major casualties. Costs to U.S. industry have been severe in terms of employment and profits. Industries in which the United States was totally dominant only a few years ago are increasingly threatened by carefully targeted, subsidized foreign competition. These industries include commercial aircraft and other transportation equipment, machine tools, computer chips, electric and nuclear power, and a growing list of high technology industries.

Various countries have targeted different industries in which to become competitive. Common to them all, however, is a governmental effort that is both well-funded and well-coordinated. Their efforts are based on three important realizations: (1) that new international markets are becoming increasingly scarce; (2) that some form of price break or other financial inducement may tip the balance toward a particular seller for Third World buyers; and (3) that the key to future sales is market penetration today—a toehold in a new market today may be parlayed into a captive market tomorrow.

Each of the governments that has joined this competition has developed and is actively implementing aggressive commerical strategies to insure its success: specific domestic industries such as steel, telecommunications, and energy have been targeted for the export push; direct subsidies have been applied to research and development activities; and preferential financing subsidies have been undertaken to spur the private sector to concentrate its effort on penetrating, pre-empting, and capturing new markets. In many cases, initial successes in winning bids provide suppliers with substantial advantages in future competition for expansion or new projects in the same sector because the exports targeted for support are large capital projects. Increasingly, the victims of these predatory, trade-distorting practices have been U.S. suppliers who have been unable to match the officially supported financial terms offered by foreign competitors.

We now stand at a crossroads in trade and finance policy. The concessional export financing practices of other governments for commerical advantage continue to increase, despite more than a decade of multilateral negotiations to bring the growing export credit struggle to a halt.

The international competitiveness of U.S. industries with true comparative advantage—industries in the energy and high technology areas, for example—is declining, in large measure because the United States has refrained from meeting and neutralizing the aggressive promotional practices of other countries. Without the ability to sell abroad, remain on the cutting edge of vital technologies, and maintain economic prosperity at home, U.S. industry will continue to falter, thereby imperiling not only our growth, employment levels, and profits, but our national security as well. In the final analysis, and sound and thriving economy will have as much to do with our world position as will the state of the arms balance.

The most damaging subsidy scheme in recent years, from the perspective of its harm to U.S. producers and exporters, has proven to be "mixed credits." Initially, mixed credits were defined as a blend of concessional government resources with public and/or private commerical credits that had the effect of reducing the real cost of an export to the buyer—often to a point where the price was below the cost of production. Recently, the term has been generally expanded to encompass official export financing subsidies for commerical purposes rather than development purposes, whether by a single source or combination of sources. These government subsidies for commerical gain are costly. They distort trade patterns and reduce competition.

The United States can and must adopt a program that enables U.S. exporters to finance the sale of U.S. goods and services on terms that are competitive with the subsidized terms offered by the governments of our aggressive trade competitors. This assistance should be carefully targeted against predatory official efforts to capture existing U.S. markets and to pre-empt and lock up new markets. The assistance should be focused on sectors of the U.S. economy in which American industry is clearly competitive with nonsubsidized foreign competition.

To meet the mixed credits challenge, the U.S. must: increase its efforts to negotiate an end to these widespread trade finance subsidies for commercial advantage; and, in support of this negotiating position, provide funding and formulate clear policy guidelines to counter and neutralize the predatory official activities of competitors.

The basis of a program to meet this unfair competition is laid out on the following pages. The program can be undertaken immediately without need for additional funding or increased authority and can be built on existing institutional arrangements. It should be continued as long as necessary to convince U.S. competitors that reliance on market forces, without the use of government subsidy, is a better way to increase trade and achieve worldwide growth and prosperity.

BACKGROUND: DEFINITION AND CONTEXT

Official export promotion efforts consist of a wide array of governmental programs in financing, insurance, guarantees, taxation, commercial reporting, and market development. All exporting countries, including the United States, provide various forms of export promotion to expand markets and increase sales. They also provide concessional export financing for developing countries that require imports to meet critical development needs. In recent years, however, the distinction between acceptable export promotion practices and development assistance efforts has been blurred, particularly in the use of mixed credits.

Current international conventions provide for commonly accepted and agreed upon financial practices and terms for official export financing. They also provide methods for defining concessionality as applied to interest rates and terms. Unfortunately, however, they only narrowly define the range of unacceptable financing techniques used by countries to subsidize exports for commercial purposes. A wide range of commercially oriented subsidized financing activities escapes official notice because of this narrow approach.

Various types of mixed credits have come under some international scrutiny, but, as with other extraordinary export support measures, not enough effort has been expended to carefully define, monitor, and regulate their use. Consequently, there is some confusion in official and business circles concerning both the nature and extent of the mixed credits practice.

Mixed credits, taken broadly, include all of the following types of credit practices.

(1) Cofinancing: a mix of public capital (sourced from different public entities) or public and private capital in a single export transaction.

(2) Joint financing: a cofinancing arrangement for which there is a common list of goods and services and where financing of all or certain items are shared between colenders in agreed proportions.

(3) Parallel financing: a cofinancing arrangement in which each colender finances different goods and services or distinct parts of a project.

(4) Associated financing (as defined by the Development Assistance Committee of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development): transactions that associate, in law or in fact, some combination of Official Development Assistance (ODA), other official finance with a grant element of at least 20 percent, and official private export credits or other official flows at or near market terms.

(5) Tied aid credits: a credit that is provided for development aid purposes and is financed either exclusively from public funds or partly from public and partly from private funds.

Most official international mixed credits attention is focused on combinations of financing rather than a single export credit. In any event, whatever term is used, the use of these or any other concessional export financing techniques, principally for commercial rather than for development purposes, distorts international trade and is detrimental to the development process and the world's trading system. Other countries are using a wide variety of these techniques.

Countries offer numerous reasons for using mixed credits: to help their trade balance; to support the growth and development of specific domestic industries; to relieve domestic unemployment; to improve efficiency in specific industries through increased economies of scale; to increase the availability of cheap credit for the developing world; to leverage greater financial flows to the developing countries without undue restrictions on their use; and to provide aid at concessional rates to advanced developing countries (ADCs), like Colombia and Brazil.

Whatever the reasons, available evidence shows that an increased use of mixed credits tends to shift scarce ODA funds from the poorest countries to higher income developing countries. Further, mixed credit financing can divert ODA from the recipient country's highest priority development projects because mixed credits frequently go to sophisticated, capital-intensive projects that may not be at the top of the recipient country's development agenda.

Where legitimate development needs are served, use of concessional mixed credits may be appropriate. However, the record indicates that the domestic economic considerations of donors are usually the controlling factors in these decisions. The direct costs to the donor countries—and to the world's trading system—are great. For these reasons, the United States must continue to press for the elimination of all forms of government export subsidies for commercial purposes.

THE ORGANIZATION FOR ECONOMIC COOPERATION AND DEVELOPMENT ARRANGEMENT ON MIXED CREDITS

In February 1978, the United States and 21 other OECD countries reached agreement on principles to govern the use of export credits, including tied aid credits. Under that agreement—the OECD Guidelines for Officially Supported Export Credits (Arrangement)—the 22 signators agreed to apply common credit terms to various classes of importing countries. The Arrangement is a "gentleman's agreement" that is applicable to officially supported export credits with repayment terms of two years or more.

The principal purpose of the Arrangement is the reduction and eventual elimination of trade-distorting export credit subsidies as well as the promotion of international trade on the basis of price competition and quality considerations.

Tied aid credits usage is permitted by the Arrangement in accordance with specific guidelines. Moreover, the participants have agreed to terms for reporting derogations and for matching the nonconforming credits of both derogating participants and nonparticipants.

The guidelines include:

Considering credits with a grant element above 25 percent as Official Development Assistance (ODA) rather than as commercially oriented trade credits;

Notifying other participants promptly after commitment when a tied aid credit with a grant element above 25 percent has been offered;

Refraining from offering tied aid credits with a grant element of less than 20 percent; and Notifying other participants 10 days before commitment, when planning to offer a tied aid credit with a grant element of at least 20 percent, but less than 25 percent.

Once notification of such an offer is given, other participants have the right to match, identically or through other means, the terms of the credit. If matching results in new derogations, further time extension for discussion and action by participants also apply.

The Arrangement definition of mixed credits is far too narrow and the Arrangement reporting guidelines are far too incomplete to capture the true nature and extent of the mixed credits problem. Many types of mixed credit transactions escape proper reporting and scrutiny. Thus, parallel financing undertakings between a government entity and a private capital source, in which a package of exports are disaggregated and financed separately by each colender, would escape the Arrangement's reach and probably go unreported. This technique is commonly practiced by various countries. Moreover, many of the reports do not include enough information to be of use, either for matching by other participants or for gauging the extent of the problem. The United States has been trying to tighten up the agreement by increasing the grant element subject to prior notification, by increasing the size of the grant element necessary to be considered ODA, improving the amount and quality of reporting, and various other means. Some progress has been made, but many subsidy practices are not covered by the Arrangement and the incidence of mixed credit offers and financing continues to increase.

EXTENT OF THE PROBLEM

Hard data are not available covering the broad spectrum of activities we consider concessional mixed credits. Some countries, such as Sweden, use mixed credits as an integral part of their aid program. Some tied credits are offered in such a way that the subsidy is not directly linked to the commercial credit, others are not reported for various reasons. Countries are extremely clever in finding ways to meet the letter of international obligations while continuing to engage, for practical purposes, in what they have agreed not to do. In 1983, less than 20 percent of offers reported by Arrangement participants were in the agreed guideline range of a 20-25 percent grant element, 30 percent of the offers were in the 25-30 percent grant element range, 20 percent had a grant element "greater than 25 percent," and most of the remainder had a grant element in excess of 30 percent.

This high concentration just outside the agreed upon range is clear indication that some countries are using the definition of ODA as a disguise for commercially oriented trade practices. These unfair trade practices are hurting U.S. exporters.

Data assembled by the Export-Import Bank show that the number of mixed credits agreements offered by industrialized countries has continued to rise rapidly since 1980. The number of offering countries has also risen. Mexico, South Korea, and other Advanced Developing Countries, in addition to the traditional donor community, have begun to offer mixed credit financing. The dollar value of mixed credits offered rose significantly until 1980, remained constant at just over $2 billion annually through 1982, and increased to $3.5 billion in 1983. Mixed credit use continued at that pace into 1984.

Because of definitional limitations, these figures probably understate the incidence of mixed credits. Additionally, however, many experts believe that countries underreport either deliberately or through administrative carelessness. It is highly probable that the amount reported would increase significantly if our broader definition of mixed credits were used. Of importance, too, is the fact that mixed credits are often concentrated in certain heavily subsidized industrial sectors. Thus, the trade-distorting effects of the credits may be far greater than published data indicate. While OECD reports are not complete on this point, the data suggest this may be particularly true in the power and transportation sectors.

France has offered over 50 percent by value of all reported mixed credits. The adoption of "defensive" mixed credit programs by Canada, Japan, Germany, and others has not led France to reduce its activity. While France has cut the size (in dollars) of its mixed credits offers since 1980, the number of offers in 1983 was almost triple the 1980 level.

Most of the countries that are the principal recipients of mixed credit offers are actual or potential Eximbank customers. Six of these countries stand out in terms of dollar volume: Mexico, Brazil, Egypt, Morocco, Indonesia, and India. All except Morocco are significant U.S. export markets.

U.S. RESPONSE TO DATE: NEGOTIATING POSITION

The U.S. Treasury Department considers trade-motivated subsidized export financing wasteful, costly, and ultimately futile because it causes a budgetary drain on exporting countries, with no real trade or development advantage to show for it. U.S. Government policy is that exported goods and services should be sold on the basis of price, quality, and other intrinsic merit. To do otherwise is to neglect the marketplace and distort international trade patterns.

Consistent with this position, the United States has attempted to negotiate an end to the use of those mixed credits used primarily for export promotion. In December 1983, for the first time, mixed credits were the highest priority item on the agenda in negotiations on the OECD Arrangement on Export Credits. The United States made a number of proposals, as it has over the years, designed to expand the definition of mixed credits, to make their use more evident and to further restrict their use. The United States has taken positions consistent with this in other international negotiations as well. Progress has been limited and prospects for an early or even medium-term breakthrough do not appear to be good.

At the OECD Ministerial meeting in May 1984, the United States attempted to secure agreement to prohibit grant elements below 50 percent, a hefty increase above the current limit of 25 percent. This would have made mixed credits for commercial purposes much more expensive for the offering government. However, the United States received virtually no support for this position from the other members.

There are reports that the United States was preparing a new series of proposals to present to the export credit group of the OECD at a September 1984 meeting that was postponed. Reportedly, the proposals could limit the provision of mixed credits only to countries with lower income levels, apply the proposed 50 percent grant element only to selected high technology industries and perhaps others. We support this U.S. position and believe the United States should continue to press for adoption of these and other proposals that will reduce or eliminate these unfair practices. However, we are not optimistic about the chances for successful negotiations on these points; furthermore, we are not convinced that, even if successful, a new Agreement will stop the practice. The high incidence of offers outside the limits of the agreement in recent years is discouraging to us. The United States needs to underscore its negotiating strategy with an aggressive mixed credits program that will demonstrate the futility of continuing these predatory trade tactics.

PAST ACTIVITIES OF THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK AND AID

Before 1981, Eximbank selectively matched the interest rate subsidy on mixed credits offered by others, winning some deals for U.S. business. However, the U.S. Government did not find this approach to be effective in developing negotiating leverage and the practice ceased. In October 1982, the Eximbank introduced a medium-term credit program to provide fixed rate support for those medium-term export sales up to $5 million that are facing subsidized, officially supported export credit competition from abroad. With evidence of the competition, Eximbank can provide fixed rate financing to the U.S. bank financing the export sale. Eximbank has, in some cases, offered to extend grace periods and repayment terms as a way to counter interest rate subsidies offered by competitors. This is considered to be an effective negotiating tactic because of the superiority of U.S. capital markets as a source of long-term capital. However, Eximbank has not aggressively sought out opportunities to counter subsidized credits.

In 1982, AID adopted a policy on mixed credits that delineated their use for export financing. The policy recognizes that other donors actively use mixed credits. AID agreed to consider financing mixed credits using ESF funds, but only to counter specific offers and only in specific cases in which the project has a high priority in the recipient country's development. AID also adopted a program to meet mixed credit competition in Egypt, specifically allocating funds for the purpose. However, restrictions placed on the use of funds, including the requirement for evidence of concessional competing offers, are very tight.

Shortly before the OECD Ministerial meeting in May 1984 the Export-Import Bank made two mixed credit offers in response to competing mixed credit offers from France. One was to finance the sale of machine tools to Indonesia, the other to finance the sale of telephone switching equipment in Cyprus. Since that time, Eximbank has made a small number of additional offers of mixed credit financing in response to offers made by other countries.

The Indonesia sale demonstrates the high cost of this type of activity. It was a $15 million contract by a U.S. manufacturer. Over the life of the contract, Eximbank income will be reduced by $16 million compared to the income that would have been generated by its normal rates. The Eximbank subsidy amounted to 40 percent of the contract price; cost per job created was $47,500. This subsidy cost is in line with estimates of the Congressional Budget Office on the overall cost of mixed credits.

CURRENT LEGISLATIVE GUIDANCE

In November 1983, Congress passed legislation that extended the financing authority of the Export-Import Bank and provided guidance on mixed credits and Eximbank's operating policy. The legislation emphasized Eximbank's mandate to provide export financing that is fully competitive with that offered by other countries. It directed the executive branch to take two specific actions. First, the legislation directed the President to pursue vigorously international negotiations to limit and set rules for the use of tied aid for exports. Specified negotiating objectives were in line with already existing government positions. Second, the legislation directed AID and the Export-Import Bank to establish mixed credit programs competitive with those of other exporting nations. Mixed credit offers under these programs are to be coordinated by an interagency committee and require the unanimous consent of its members.

Congress made it clear that it wants the United States to be more aggressive in meeting unfair financing competition from other exporting countries.

Eximbank and AID have developed standards and guidelines for the programs called for by Congress. AID's program is proposed to extend to a limited number of countries because of other legislative requirements. The Eximbank plans to act on a case by case basis, using both interest rate concessions and improved terms as necessary to meet competition. By terms of the legislation, the National Advisory Council must pass on each transaction. Substantially increased activity from either Eximbank or AID in support of U.S. exports is unlikely, however, for the following reasons.

Concessional terms are very expensive to the Eximbank and it wants to maintain its commercial standing.

AID's primary interest is in carrying out its development mandate in those countries in which it operates and in assuring that any use of its Economic Support Funds be consistent with the economic, security, and political criteria used to establish ESF country allocations.

The principal recipients of mixed credit offers are countries in which AID has little or no activity.

AID believes that the unqualified use of mixed credits could divert its assistance from the neediest countries and from a recipient's highest priority projects.

The interagency coordination process is bureaucratic, time-consuming, and not suited to the pressing needs of timely action.

FINDINGS

The United States and its exporters are losing markets to countries that provide concessional credit to their exports for commercial purposes.

Past U.S. Government actions to meet commercially motivated subsidized financing competition have been limited and ineffective.

The U.S. negotiating posture in regard to mixed credits is essentially right, but it is not likely to be effective in the short to medium term.

U.S. Government agency responses to the initiatives directed by Congress have not resulted in a significantly more aggressive stance by the United States.

A new approach is needed in order to support U.S. negotiating efforts and permit U.S. exporters to compete on equal financing terms with exporters from other countries who benefit from officially subsidized financing.

If recent history is any measure, progress in negotiations in the near future is likely to continue to be slow and indecisive. Recent steps taken by the DAC to broaden the range of mixed credit activities proscribed by international agreement are welcome. Welcome, too, is France's recent decision to withdraw a line of credit to Algiers for subway construction. But we must maintain the effort to negotiate an end to this expensive and wasteful practice.

The United States should assign the highest priority to negotiations directed at stopping the practice of governments using various methods of subsidizing export finance to commercial advantage.

We strongly endorse the Administration's policy to put an end to these subsidies, which are costly, wasteful, and ultimately gain nothing for those nations that engage in the practice. Goods and services should move in international commerce according to their intrinsic value and the marketing effort behind their sale; subsidized financing does not contribute to their value, nor does it lead to the eventual reduction of production costs. To the contrary, it enables the movement of goods that might otherwise find no market. This does not promote the best interests of either buyer or seller; in the long run, continued use of mixed credits will have an adverse effect on the growth of trade, the world's economy, and prospects for improved living standards.

The United States should actively discourage the use of mixed credits and other forms of commercially motivated subsidized financing in the appropriate multilateral fora and in bilateral discussions with those nations that engage in the practice.

The United States should be prepared, up to the limit of Eximbank's lending and guarantee authority, to fund an aggressive program of subsidized export financing to meet the competition of other countries. The program should remain in effect until other countries discontinue their mixed credit programs.

The Export-Import Bank is the principal official financing arm of United States trade policy and is specifically charged with promoting U.S. exports "at rates and on terms and conditions that are fully competitive with other countries and consistent with international agreements." Eximbank finances exports to many countries that are recipients of mixed credit offers. A program to compete directly against a broad range of unfair mixed credits would be consistent with the bank's mandate to be competitive, but it would be inconsistent with its mandate to remain financially sound, as large amounts of concessional financing would lead to losses on the bank's portfolio. However, existing authority is adequate for Eximbank to undertake such a program immediately; new legislation would not be required.

Eximbank has substantial unused financing authority and total financing ceilings that should be sufficient to accommodate any activity that is likely to be generated by this program. In FY 1983 it used less than $1.5 billion of its nearly $4 billion lending authority and less than $7 billion of its $10 billion guarantee and insurance authority. Lending, guarantee and insurance authority for 1985 are expected to be in the same order of magnitude. A similar shortfall is likely in 1984. Unused ceilings on Eximbank's lending authority totaled several billion dollars.

Other U.S. institutions such as AID would not be as effective in a mixed credits program. AID has strong developmental mandates in which trade and export promotion are not key factors. In addition, AID has limited resources that are primarily devoted to countries to which mixed credits are not directed. Legislation would be required to thrust AID into a strong trade promotion role. Not only would start-up time be longer with AID, but the institutional difficulties would be extensive.

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK: AMOUNT REQUIRED

Available data do not provide a solid basis for estimating the funds that might be required. Eximbank believes that 13 export transactions valued at $576 million may have been lost to foreign mixed credits (narrow definition) over the four-year period from August 1979 to August 1983, an average of almost $150 million per year. Documentation for lost sales is very difficult to produce because there is no effective way to collect the necessary data. In recent years, the amount of mixed credit offers by other countries has averaged about $2 billion per year. It increased to $3.5 billion in 1983 and will be at least that amount in 1984. Estimates of lost exports and mixed credit activity generally would probably be much higher if they were based on a broader definition of mixed credits—one that reflects the full range of commercially oriented subsidized financing techniques used by our foreign competitors. This, in addition to underreporting, might well double the reported $3.5 billion.

COST TO THE UNITED STATES

According to estimates of the Congressional Budget Office, the cost to the Eximbank in lost interest over the life of a credit, when used to match a competing mixed credit with a 25 percent grant element, would be about 40 percent of the face amount of the loan. As an example, the use of $1 billion a year for mixed credit financing would therefore reduce Eximbank income by approximately $400 million over the life of the loans or about $40 million per year. These losses would not be recovered.

This $40 million annual loss of income to Eximbank would be a small fraction of its annual interest income, which amounted to more than $1.4 billion in FY 1983. However, its net losses of $247 million in FY 1983 would increase further if this loss of interest from a mixed credit program had also been reflected in the bottom line.

CRITERIA FOR USE

The purpose of this more aggressive stance would be to counter the use of subsidized mixed credit financing (in its broad meaning) by export competitors. The difficulties with data collection already enumerated will be much worse when facing the need for quick action to meet a competitive offer. Guidelines for the program need to be established so that exporters and bankers have a clear understanding of when, and under what circumstances, Eximbank funds can be drawn upon.

Although they need further definition and refinement, the following criteria provide an initial framework.

Eximbank should offer financing to U.S. exporters that will enable the exporters to compete on equivalent terms with exporters from other countries who benefit from commercially oriented concessional credit (mixed credits). In some cases, Eximbank may provide identical financing packages; in other cases it might include some other combination of down payment, rate, term, and grace period concessions that would be equal, but not superior, to the competing financing.

Eximbank should aggressively counter competing offers. For instance, in qualified cases in which Eximbank believes there will be mixed credit competition, it should use the prior notification, procedures under the OECD Arrangement to query the country in question about its intent. If the country involved uses mixed credits extensively and does not provide a clear negative response to the query, Eximbank should be directed to operate on the assumption that a mixed credit package will be offered and it should provide appropriate financing to the U.S. exporter. In other cases, Eximbank may have to make judgments about the intent behind competing offers—whether the principal motivation is commercial or developmental.

All operations undertaken should be consistent with U.S. responsibilities under the OECD Arrangement, which permits matching of competing offers, and with other U.S. international commitments.

Eximbank should pay particular attention to those products of competing countries that have benefited most from mixed credits, such as telecommunications, power, and transport equipment firms. However, it should not exclude any products in which U.S. exporters can be price-competitive.

Eximbank should not exclude products that are in world oversupply, such as copper or steel processing equipment, because to do so would be tantamount to announcing that the United States is leaving the field to others. However, it is current U.S. policy not to finance such exports. We do not quarrel with the policy. Our clear preference would be to avoid these areas, but given the needs of the program, flexibility may be required.

SUMMARY

The Eximbank program can be implemented now. It is needed to make U.S. exports competitive with the subsidized commercial exports of our competitors. It will improve the U.S. negotiating position by trying to eliminate commercial export subsidies. It will serve U.S. exporters and the national interest. The President should direct the Export-Import Bank to undertake such a program immediately and continue it until our competitors stop using these predatory and expensive practices.●

CATHOLIC SCHOOLS WEEK

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, National Catholic Schools Week has been designated as February 4 through February 8, 1985. And it is with great pleasure that I would like to pay tribute to the accomplishments of our Nation's Catholic primary and secondary schools.

For many years, Catholic schools have provided our Nation's parents with an important alternative to public education for their children. Today, more than 2½ million children attend Catholic schools in this country. In New Jersey, more than 166,000 students are attending parochial elementary and secondary schools.

It is impossible to overemphasize the important educational role that Catholic schools have played in America. By providing solid academic training, Catholic schools have been responsible for producing students who are well prepared to meet the challenges of our ever-growing competitive society. But, by giving young Americans a firm spiritual foundation, Catholic schools have, in turn, provided both the Catholic Church and the Nation with wise and compassionate leaders.

The theme for this year's observance of Catholic Schools Week is "Sharing the vision-teaching values." This emphasis on values is a key component of Catholic education. We are a stronger and more spiritual nation because of these institutions. They are certainly deserving of our high commendation.●

TAX DEDUCTION FOR CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, last week I sent a letter to Secretary of the Treasury James A. Baker, expressing my deep concern over the Treasury Department's proposal to limit tax deductions for charitable contributions as part a new tax simplification plan.

My concern is what would happen to a host of organizations whose existence relies in whole or in part to the generosity of taxpaying Americans. Churches, schools, colleges and universities, museums, social service agencies, and other organizations would likely suffer a significant loss of support. At a time when budget constraints limit the ability of Congress to increase direct funding support for many worthwhile activities, now is not the time to remove this important incentive for support from the private sector.

Mr. President, I ask consent to insert into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of my letter to Secretary Baker, urging the administration to drop the proposal limiting the tax deductibility of charitable contributions.

The letter follows:

JANUARY 29, 1985.

Hon. JAMES A. BAKER,
Secretary of Treasury,
Washington, DC.

DEAR JIM: My purpose in writing today is to express my very deep concern about one element of the Treasury Department's tax simplification proposal, namely the effect it would have upon charitable contributions.

I fear that if this proposal is adopted, it will have severe repercussions upon a host of organizations in the United States—churches, schools and universities, museums and other charitable entities—which rely either in whole or in part upon the generosity of taxpaying Americans.

While limiting the deductibility of charitable contributions would not bring an end to philanthropy, such limits could very well jeopardize the programs of many private organizations and, in the case of some, put them out of business. If this were to happen, the irony would be that Congress could well be deluged with new calls for increased government aid and support, thus defeating the goal of this Administration to cut spending.

A few figures about charitable contributions have begun to emerge since the Treasury proposal was unveiled. Private colleges and universities, for example, receive, on average, 11 percent of their operating funds from gifts, and the fear is growing that this percentage would fall if the deductions that could be claimed for such contributions were limited. Given the Administration's call for futher cutbacks in student aid, such fears are legitimate.

Other organizations rely far more heavily upon private gifts, notably churches and such community charities as the United Way, which estimates the donations it receives could fall as much as 20 percent if the Treasury proposed is adopted.

I realize that a debate is now going on within the Administration over the final scope of the tax simplification plan to be submitted to Congress later this year. I would urge you to use your influence to drop the provisions relating to charitable deductions. I believe such provisions will not find favor with Congress and will merely divert attention from the larger issue of tax reform. If, by chance, such provisions were to be adopted, they would not only cause a great deal of harm to countless private organizations which rely upon charity, but would also be counterproductive, setting off new demands for increased federal government aid which we cannot afford.

I look forward to hearing from you on this matter.

Sincerely,

JOHN H. CHAFEE,
U.S. Senator.●

REDUCING THE FEDERAL BUDGET BY CHANGING THE STRUCTURE OF REPAYMENT PLANS ON FEDERAL ELECTRIC HYDRO PROJECTS IS A BAD IDEA

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, as we begin the 99th Congress with a renewed spirit and vigor to attack the problem of the Federal deficit, I urge my colleagues to move prudently and cautiously. Not all the ideas presently circulating in the Office of Management and Budget are good ones.

In particular I am referring to OMB's four-part scheme to reduce the Federal debt through increased revenues from Federal power marketing agencies being circulated by the Office of Management and Budget. This four-part scheme calls for significant changes in the structure of repayment plans associated with outstanding debt on Federal hydroelectric projects. These changes could have far-reaching, detrimental impacts on customers buying power from the Federal Government. Specifically, OMB proposes to:

First, convert the amortization schedule to a straight-line method of repayment;

Second, bring interest rates on outstanding debt to the Treasury's current rate of borrowing;

Third, accelerate repayment of the projects' irrigation features to make it concurrent with power facility repayments; and Fourth, assess interest, at current market levels, to the irrigation portions of the project.

Federal dams planned and built by the Federal Government in the 1950's and 1960's were meant to fulfill a public policy of making the West habitable by providing water for irrigation, municipal and industrial uses. Only by devising means to store surplus in wet years for later use in dry spells could these arid lands become productive.

Knowing that the cost of these dams must somehow be repaid to the Federal Treasury and that irrigation water priced at full cost would be prohibitively expensive, the Bureau installed hydroelectric power facilities in the dams to provide revenues to repay the investment. Power users were asked to repay not only the investment in the power facilities, plus the market rate of interest prevailing at the time, but also the operating and maintenance costs of the dams and a portion of the water storage and irrigation features of the projects.

Since they were designed primarily as water projects—not as power projects—Congress required power users to offset irrigation costs. Irrigation features were to be repaid without interest.

Power from these projects, however, was expensive. Compared to coal-fired resources built at the same time, the cost of Federal hydroelectric power was 30-50 percent higher. The Bureau had difficulty finding enough users to fully subscribe to all the available power at that time. Because of the high cost, contracts were structured to fully repay both the power investment and the irrigation component at the lowest rates possible in keeping with sound business principles. Not until 1974 did the cost of this power become cheaper than coal-fired generation constructed at the same time.

Like a home mortgage, the repayment schedule is structured to recover interest costs first. This means very little is applied toward principal in the early years of the contract. By 1989, however, power users will have repaid about 56 percent, or $405 million, of power facilities in just the Colorado River storage project alone. This project serves power consumers in my home State of Wyoming. Once principal in the power-generating facilities is repaid, power revenues will be applied toward irrigation costs.

EFFECTS OF THE OMB PROPOSAL

With this historical background in mind, let us assess what the OMB proposals would mean. The first proposal I mentioned was to convert to a straight-line amortization method.

In my view this proposal would impose on power users an unfeasible and perhaps unattainable revenue obligation. In high water years, excess power sales generate additional revenues. Like a prudent home buyer, the Federal power-marketing agencies apply these revenues to outstanding principal on loans carrying the highest interest rate. Thus, higher cost loans can be retired more quickly, and rates can be kept at a lower level for a longer period of time.

In poor water years, the PMA's must purchase power to meet contract obligations. During these periods, they pay only interest and redistribute missed principal payments across the remaining repayment term. This practice of accelerating and deferring principal payments is essential in giving the PMA's necessary flexibility to operate in erratic water cycles and still fulfill their contractual obligations to the Treasury.

OMB's proposed straight-line method to require fixed levels of interest and principal payments would remove this flexibility. Therefore, it would greatly burden power users with higher rates in poor water years. Since the weather is something which cannot be controlled, any scheme which would mitigate the present system of cyclical revenue collections would be needlessly complex when a method that so adequately evens out these fluctuations already exists.

Furthermore, requiring users to begin paying a market rate of interest on the remaining outstanding debt will compound problems of a straight-line amortization schedule by greatly increasing interest costs at a time when they are scheduled to decline as a proportion of power rates.

More unsettling, however, is the notion that the Federal Government would manipulate power rates to reflect something other than their true cost. When many of these projects were authorized, interest rates were in the range of 3 to 4 percent. Power users entered into contracts with the Federal Government to repay the cost of these projects at a rate of interest comparable to what they could have obtained from the private money market.

To arbitrarily double and triple those rates 25 years later not only violates contract terms, but it also sets a potentially dangerous precedent. This is a precedent I do not believe the Congress should even consider making in view of the fact that article 1, section 10 of the Constitution precludes a State from passing any laws which impair the obligations of contracts. The responsibilities of the Federal Government, in this instance, should be no less than those of States.

One of Congress' stated benefits in selling Federal hydroelectric power to nonprofit, consumer-owned utilities was to provide a "yardstick" measure of competition with investor-owned utilities. Rates set at some arbitrary level to fatten the Treasury rather than recover costs will destroy this measure of competition, thus hurting all ratepayers.

There will be no market for Federal hydroelectric power if rates are set at levels higher than that of recovering costs. Finding their rates have become a political football, utilities would prefer to finance their own projects, knowing that contract terms will not change midstream, and in the end, the projects belong to them, not the Federal Government. Moreover, once we try to price power at artificial levels rather than at cost-recovery, we lose the ability to effectively regulate electric utility rates.

As to the proposal to require power users to repay the cost of irrigation features with interest at the market rate, such a proposal is absolutely contrary to congressional intent in establishing these projects. Congress was extremely clear in stipulating that irrigation features should be charged no interest. Making these costs repayable at the same time as power costs will also create a significant burden upon power users in the form of higher rates.

No reasonable person can fault OMB for trying to reduce the Federal budget deficit. We must find a way to do this, and cuts must be made. However, I do not think the way to approach the problem of the deficit is to recommend the breaking of contracts, or to single out a specific group of taxpayers to bear a disproportionate burden in paring the deficit. Quite simply, because of their broad policy implications, these proposals should be summarily rejected.

At a time when power users in the West could have purchased power at cheaper rates or built their own projects with long-term security, power users in the West chose to enter a partnership with the Federal Government in developing water projects to transform their region into viable agricultural and industrial centers. They have always paid their own way. There is no Federal subsidy involved with power rates. Therefore, Western power users should not be penalized for their dependence on Federal hydropower.

Maximum revenues necessary to repay the cost of Federal water projects need not translate into maximum power rates. OMB's proposal is a serious break with the long-standing Federal policy of this Nation to keep energy costs as low as possible for its citizens. It would be wrong to abandon this policy by asking Federal power users to bear such an inequitable and unfair burden as OMB has proposed. The ultimate result would only be the possibility of excessive and uncontrollable electric utility rates at a time in our Nation's history when the present administration has been successful in knocking out inflation as the country's leading economic problem.

Although all the numbers are not yet in on what the impact of these proposals would be on the Western Area Power Administration, I do not think it is wistful thinking to say that the WAPA firm rate may double on the wholesale rates to public power users. And, I might point out that the wholesale rate is just part of the problem. Final customer rates could quadruple. In fact, just for the Colorado River storage project alone rough estimates show that CRSP rates would increase 300 to 400 percent!

I simply do not think it is proper for the administration to be proposing that we make a profit on power generated from dams built from taxpayer funds and sold at cheap rates to public utility preference customers and others. The whole point of building these facilities in the first place was to make cheap power available to everyone. I, therefore, would urge that my colleagues in the Senate join with me in opposing this idea. I also would like to remind the administration that if policy is to be changed on this issue, then such changes are properly within the purview of the Congress. This is not something which the administration should do administratively.●

WHICH WAY ON ABORTION?

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I should like to commend to my colleagues an article entitled "Which Way on Abortion?" by Russ Pulliam. This article appeared in the Indianapolis News on January 23, 1985. The author states his case more eloquently than I can, but he is essentially saying that the Supreme Court's reason for finding in favor of Roe versus Wade is no longer valid. The Court held that abortion could be legal during the first two trimesters of pregnancy because during the earlier months of a pregnancy, the fetus was not "viable," or able to live and develop on its own. Advances in intensive care nurseries and the wonderful proliferation of intensive care neonatal units at our Nation's hospitals help give the very premature infant a much better chance of survival. As the author points out, the Supreme Court's decision to legalize abortion needs rethinking. I quite agree, and I hope my colleagues will take the time to read this excellent article.

I ask tht the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

WHICH WAY ON ABORTION?

(By Russ Pulliam)

Its been 12 years since the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in favor of abortion as a matter of privacy.

The result has been millions of abortions not because of rape, incest or danger to the mother's life, but as a means of getting rid of an unwanted baby.

In one sense it seems inevitable that this kind of abortion as a convenience will be stopped in the next few years.

In another sense, though, the pressure to continue abortions of this kind will be immense. The abortion industry is making lots of money off these operations and won't want to see this revenue reduced by some law or court ruling.

The pressure to halt this kind of abortion is also building. Medical technology is undoing the Supreme Court's basis for its decision, which was the "viability" of the baby inside the mother's womb.

Based on medical studies and a lot of guesswork, Justice Harry Blackmun arrived at the idea that a baby is not a human being for the first six months of the mother's pregnancy. But after those six months the baby is "viable" and thus states can restrict abortions during the third trimester.

But more and more babies are medically "viable" during the second trimester, rendering the 1973 decision almost out of date in terms of science. In California doctors managed to deliver a baby alive in 1983, though the mother died before the end of the baby's second trimester.

We talked to the baby, we called him by name when we knew he was a boy. We treated him as if he was a baby outside, but he was inside," commended nurse Pat Will even after the delivery.

Dr. Thomas Elkins of the University of Tennessee Medical Center contends that these kinds of medical possibilities are growing. "With our intensive care nursery system now newborn babies that were repeatedly written off a few years ago are now surviving. A baby of one pound has an opportunity to live today—something unheard of five years ago," he said in an interview with Christianity Today magazine.

"And I think technology will soon take us to a point where a baby outside the uterus can be supported at almost any gestational age," he continues. "That's going to mean that society will have to deal with a technology challenging its values. It will mean that abortion without a medical reason is going to become more and more problematic for society."

So medical technology may force the Supreme Court to rethink the 1973 ruling.

From a legal standpoint the court also has good reasons to revise the ruling. Justice Blackmun's decision was a clear case of writing a new law, rather than interpreting the Constitution. The decision has not commanded much respect in legal circles, even among some who favor a pro-choice position on abortion.

Justice Byron White dissented from the court's divided ruling in a stinging rebuke to the majority, calling the decision "an exercise in raw judicial power" with no constitutional basis.

"I find nothing in the language or history of the Constitution to support the court's judgment," he wrote. "The court simply fashions and announces a new constitutional right for pregnant mothers and, with scarcely any reason or authority for its action, invests that right with sufficient substance to override most existing state abortion statutes."

More recently Justice Sandra Day O'Connor has attacked the 1973 decision as well, complaining about the inappropriate course that the court took in writing regulations about trimesters for all the states to follow.

So the court may well reverse itself, from a combination of legitimate legal concerns as well as the evidence from advancing medical technology.

The issue boils down to when a human being becomes a human being. The 1973 court decision noted the disagreements among scientists, theologians and philosophers on this question. But why take such a big chance when the issue is the life and death of millions of babies?●

ORDERS FOR WEDNESDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until 11 a.m. on Wednesday, February 6, 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that, following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there be special orders for the following Senators for not to exceed 15 minutes each: Senators SPECTER, PROXMIRE, BOREN, HEFLIN, BYRD, CRANSTON, INOUYE, and COHEN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Following the special orders just identified, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 2 p.m. with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, tomorrow, following morning business, it will be the intention of the leadership to go into executive session to consider the nominations of William Bennett and Donald Hodel, hopefully under time agreements of 1 hour each; and, also following the conclusion of the debate on the two nominations, it will be the intention of the leadership to turn to the nomination of John Herrington, for Secretary of Energy. Therefore, at least two, possibly three, rollcall votes can be expected during Wednesday's session.

RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move in accordance with the order just entered that the Senate stand in recess until 11 a.m. tomorrow.

Thereupon, at 4:57 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 6, 1985, at 11 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Secretary of the Senate February 4, 1985, under authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1985:

ACTION AGENCY

Donna M. Alvarado, of Virginia, to be Director of the ACTION Agency, vice Thomas W. Pauken.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION

Brig. Gen. Thomas Allen Sands, 410-64-1086, U.S. Army, to be a member and president of the Mississippi River Commission, and Brig. Gen. Robert Joseph Dacey, 124-26-8224, U.S. Army, to be a member of the Mississippi River Commission, under the provisions of section 2 of an Act of Congress, approved 28 June 1879 (21 Stat. 37) (33 U.S.C. 642).

NATIONAL COUNCIL ON THE HANDICAPPED

The following-named persons to be members of the National Council on the Handicapped for the terms indicated:

For a term expiring September 17, 1986:

Jeremiah Milbank, of Connecticut, vice Carmine R. Lavieri, deceased.

For a term expiring September 17, 1987:

Justin W. Dart, Jr., of Texas (reappointment).

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 5, 1985:

IN THE ARMY

The following-named officer to be placed on the retired list in grade indicated under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 3962:

To be general

Gen. Bernard W. Rogers, [redacted] (age 63), U.S. Army.

The following-named officer under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to the grade of general in a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601, to which grade he was appointed during the recess of the Senate from October 12, 1984, until January 3, 1985:

Gen. Robert C. Kingston, [redacted] U.S. Army.

The Army National Guard of the United States officers named herein for appointment as Reserve Commissioned Officers of the Army, under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, sections 593(a), 3385, and 3392:

To be major general

Brig. Gen. James A. Baber III, [redacted]

Brig. Gen. Bernard G. Ehrlich, [redacted]

Brig. Gen. Vernon E. James, [redacted]

To be brigadier general

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, February 6, 1985

The House met at 2 p.m.

Rev. Byron R. Wilkinson, Sr., pastor, Arlington United Methodist Church, Arlington, VA, offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, whose creative and redemptive work is always for the good of the Earth's people, we affirm our dependency upon You in becoming Your servants as we begin today's busy agenda.

We sense our responsibility in legislating for billions of people. We would not have us to pray for Your wisdom and strength as a substitute for work. You know we are expected to do our part, for You have made us as persons with minds to think and energy to expend. You have given us the responsibility to do something for the good of the Earth's people and we are grateful.

Enable us to enjoy our tasks. Help us to receive Your wisdom and guidance and then to dispatch our responsibilities as if all that we do depended on us that together we may do that which is well pleasing in Your sight and meaningful in our lives; in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

REV. BYRON R. WILKINSON, SR.

(Mr. WOLF asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to welcome for the invocation in the House Chamber today Rev. Byron R. Wilkinson, pastor of the Arlington United Methodist Church in Arlington, VA. I am also pleased to welcome Reverend Wilkinson's wife Alice who has joined us today in the House gallery.

Reverend Wilkinson has had a long and distinguished career both as a pastor and as a New Life Missioner, leading missions throughout the eastern United States, Australia, and England. In addition, Reverend Wilkinson has served as a leader and faculty member of Clergy Conferences and Ministers Convocations and as the president of the Board of Discipleship and a member of the Division of Evangelism in the Virginia Conference of the United Methodist Church.

Reverend Wilkinson has a B.A. degree from Roanoke College, Salem, VA, and a master of divinity degree from Wesley Theological Seminary in Washington, DC. He also holds a certificate in clinical pastoral work from Roanoke, VA, and a teaching certificate from the Evangelical Teacher Training Association.

Mr. Speaker, it is always an honor for one to have a minister or priest or rabbi from one's congressional district give the invocation in the House Chamber. And it is an especially high honor for me to welcome as my constituent someone of Rev. Byron Wilkinson's stature in the ministry.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, DC,
February 5, 1985.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to the permission granted in Clause 5, Rule III of the Rules of the U.S. House of Representatives, I have the honor to transmit a sealed envelope received from the White House at 4:15 p.m. on Tuesday, February 5, 1985 and said to contain a message from the President whereby he transmits the Economic Report of the President, together with the Annual Report of the Council of Economic Advisers.

With kind regards, I am,
Sincerely,

BENJAMIN J. GUTHRIE,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

HOUSE MUST SEAT CONGRESSMAN McINTYRE

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I have received a copy of the letter from the Indiana secretary of state advising us that Richard McIntyre was and remains the duly elected Congressman from the Eighth District.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is time that you permitted Mr. McIntyre to take his seat in this Chamber.

There is nothing in the Constitution, nothing in the law, nothing in the precedents of this House, and nothing in the exercise of sound judgment or common sense, which would instruct us to deny representation to the people of the Eighth District of Indiana any longer.

I will offer a resolution to seat Congressman McIntyre tomorrow.

The resolution will ask that he be seated provisionally until such time as the whole controversy has been resolved in the House.

I hope that no effort will be made by the majority to deny us a direct vote on that resolution.

That would be a travesty heaped upon an injustice.

And I hope that all Members of this body will support that resolution.

Under my unanimous consent request, I submit a copy of the letter to the Clerk of the House from the secretary of the state of Indiana to be inserted in the RECORD at this point:

SECRETARY OF STATE,
STATE OF INDIANA,
Indianapolis, February 4, 1985.

Hon. BENJAMIN J. GUTHRIE,
Clerk, U.S. House of Representatives, The Capitol, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. GUTHRIE: This is to inform you that the recount of votes cast in the General Election held November 6, 1984 for the office of Representative in Congress for the 8th Congressional District of Indiana has been completed. Pursuant to Indiana Statutes (Ind. Rev. Code 3-1-27-1 et seq.) both candidates petitioned the county courts of the 8th District of Indiana for a recount. In turn, those courts have forwarded those recount results to me.

Based on the 15 recount certificates received by this office, the election results are as follows:

Richard D. McIntyre, 114,278 votes.
Francis X. McCloskey, 113,860 votes.

These results give Mr. McIntyre a 418 vote plurality over Mr. McCloskey. Therefore, the Certificate of Election previously forwarded to you naming Richard D. McIntyre as duly elected to the office of Representative in Congress for the 8th District of Indiana was and remains correct.

Sincerely,

EDWIN J. SIMCOX,
Secretary of State.

WHO IS BLACKMAILING WHOM

(Mr. GLICKMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, my dictionary defines blackmail as a "payment extorted by intimidation." Apparently David Stockman and I do not share the same regard for Mr. Webster because, as I read in this morning's Washington Post, OMB thinks that keeping a strong, vital agriculture in this country, providing us with the best and most affordable supply of food in the world, is blackmail.

Mr. Stockman, ask the Kansas wheatfarmer whose prices have fallen and who faces foreclosure because he cannot meet the high cost of interest because of your bloated budget deficits if it is blackmail to ask for help to stay on the land. Ask the Iowa corn producer if it is blackmail to ask for enough temporary assistance to finance this year's crop. Ask the livestock producer who has been whipsawed by this administration's annual changes in farm policy whether it is blackmail to want to join in the economic recovery so hailed by you, Mr. Stockman, but unseen in farm country.

Last week Mr. Stockman marched up here and demanded Congress sign a contract with him, a contract for short-term credit relief in exchange for support for a farm bill cutting the legs out from under American agriculture. Mr. Stockman, I submit it is not agriculture who has reneged or who has balked—it has kept its bargain and has provided us food security unknown and unequaled. It is this administration who has reneged on its contract with American agriculture and who now has the gall to accuse agriculture of blackmail.

In case our dictionaries are still out of sync, Mr. Stockman, "gall," is something bitter, impudent, and an affront.

THE FAIR TRADE IN FERROALLOYS ACT

(Mr. MILLER of Ohio asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, today, I and several of my colleagues are introducing the Fair Trade in Ferroalloys Act. The only way to prevent the loss of what remains of the domestic ferroalloy industry, which now has an import penetration of 60 percent, and to protect our national security interests is to provide the industry with some form of systematic import relief targeted at the unfairly low pricing of imports. The most effective and least market intrusive method is the "break-point" duty which the Fair Trade in Ferroalloys Act would provide. I, therefore, urge my colleagues to cosponsor the fair trade in ferroalloys bill. As a means of more fully familiarizing you with the pressing need for this legislation, I have submitted a detailed explanation of the problems confronting our country's ferroalloy industry which can be found in the Extensions of Remarks section of today's RECORD.

MR. STOCKMAN AND FARM POLICY

(Mr. BEDELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Stockman has now accused the farm people of blackmail. I think we better look at what the situation is.

It is my understanding that when we came to him for help in regard to our credit problems he said he would give help if we would agree to accept the farm program that they proposed.

Mr. Speaker, that is sort of like giving an injection to somebody to keep them alive and then telling them they cannot have the medicine they need in order to become healthy.

He also said that he had no sympathy for farmers if they owned 200 acres of land and, therefore, were worth a quarter of a million dollars. Let me tell you: those farmers are in debt. They do not have that net worth.

My farmers do not want welfare either. My farmers simply want a chance to be able to compete equally, on equal terms with the foreign competitors with whom they compete.

I think Mr. Stockman had better learn what foreign governments are doing for their farmers if he wants us to compete fairly. If he is going to talk about welfare, maybe he ought to look at the President's tax cut which said that GE and Westinghouse and Du Pont and all of the other big companies would not only have to pay taxes but the taxpayers would give them refunds of millions and millions of dollars.

Maybe he had better decide that farm income is just as important as the heartland of America is to remain healthy, just as important as Chrysler and Continental Illinois and those others. I think Mr. Stockman has something to learn about what our society is like. I hope he learns it before it is too late.

BILINGUAL BALLOTS

(Mr. BADHAM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to terminate the effect of provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 that require bilingual ballots and election materials and to permit the States to determine whether such ballots and materials are necessary.

Few would deny the premise that command and proficiency of the English language is vital to immigrants if they anticipate becoming participating and contributing members of our communities. In order for an immigrant to become a U.S. citizen, our laws state that he or she must read, write, and speak English in ordinary usage. Our laws also mandate, however, that immigrants who vote must be provided with ballots in their native language if the community in which they reside has at least a 5-percent non-English-speaking population.

This multilingual policy at the ballot box, where the voter employs his most valuable right of citizenship, often presents an undue financial burden in localities where the cost of printing bilingual ballots clearly outweighs the demand for those ballots. As an example, Federal law requires that ballots be translated from English to Spanish in 10 California counties. In Orange County, a portion of which I represent, the registrar of voters has said that $92,000 was spent for the ballots for the June 1984 election. And in that election, only about 2,000 registered voters out of 618,000 requested materials in Spanish.

More importantly, the people of California have expressed their opinion quite clearly. In the November 1984 election, proposition 38, an initiative calling on Congress to end bilingual voting, receiving 71 percent of the vote. Of the 58 counties in California, all passed this initiative with several favoring it by over 79 percent. This is a clear indication that the people of one of our largest States do not agree with the Federal mandate.

Based on these example evidencing the minimal demand, high cost, and the opinion expressed by California voters regarding bilingual ballots, I hope that the majority of my colleagues will join me in supporting this legislation to repeal the Federal requirement for bilingual ballots.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO CERTAIN STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Democratic caucus and by direction of the Democratic caucus, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 43) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 43

Resolved, That the following named Members and Delegate be, and they are hereby, elected to the following standing committees of the House of Representatives:

Committee on Agriculture: Terry Bruce, Illinois (effective only for the first session of the Ninety-Ninth Congress);

Committee on Education and Labor: Stephen J. Solarz, New York, Mervyn M. Dymally, California, Dennis E. Eckart, Ohio, Timothy J. Penny, Minnesota, and Chester G. Atkins, Massachusetts (all effective only for the first session of the Ninety-Ninth Congress);

Committee on Foreign Affairs: Robert Garcia, New York (effective only for the first session of the Ninety-Ninth Congress);

Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs: Mel Levine, California;

Committee on Post Office and Civil Service: Ron de Lugo, Virgin Islands (effective only for the first session of the Ninety-Ninth Congress);

Committee on Public Works and Transportation: Carl C. Perkins, Kentucky (effective only for the first session of the Ninety-Ninth Congress);

Committee on Small Business: Tommy F. Robinson, Arkansas (effective only for the first session of the Ninety-Ninth Congress).

Mr. GEPHARDT [during the reading]. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DAVID STOCKMAN DOESN'T SEEM TO KNOW THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN A MILK COW AND A MANURE SPREADER

(Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota asked permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the administration's major spokesperson on farm issues, Mr. David Stockman, has treated us once again to his opinions. He is now saying that the farm group in Congress is trying to blackmail the administration to get some help for family farmers.

It seems to me that we ought to hear from someone in the administration who knows something about farming. This administration sends David Stockman out to talk to us about agriculture. With due respect, I have said before, I do not think he could tell the difference between a milk cow and a manure spreader.

Let me remind Mr. Stockman that when Chrysler was in trouble, we rushed to help; when Lockheed was in trouble, the Government rushed to help; when Mexico was in trouble, we sent people to New York to spend all weekend to help; when the IMF needed money, we said, "no problem."

Tom Paxton wrote a song awhile back—the title was, "I'm changing my name to Chrysler."

One million farmers are in desperate trouble and they ought not to have to change their name to make sure this Congress gives them the help they need, help that would be good for them, but most especially help that would be good for this country.

WE SHOULD SEAT (RICK) McINTYRE

(Mr. FRENZEL asked permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, today, I made a motion in the Committee on House Administration to seat Congressman-elect McIntyre conditionally pending the outcome of the investigation to be carried on under House Resolution 1.

The committee voted on party lines not to consider my motion.

Tomorrow, the minority leader will make a similar motion before the whole House. Now if, after Richard McIntyre has been elected, been certified, and had his election and his certification reaffirmed by a recount, and if after all that happens, the House does to BOB'S motion what it does to mine, Thursday is going to be another day of shame for this House of Representatives.

It is time we started to obey the law and the precedents and to follow the Constitution and the tenets of representative government.

It is time for the House to seat Rick McIntyre.

AMERICAN RATEPAYERS OUGHT NOT TO BE PREBILLED FOR POWERPLANTS

(Mr. GEJDENSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, last year, this House passed a piece of legislation that would have stopped American utilities from picking the pockets of American ratepayers.

Since FERC has passed its regulation that allows utilities to pass on 50 percent of the financing cost of construction for work in progress, 28 utilities from New England to California have come in and requested that ratepayers pick up the tab for building plants before they are used and useful, before they are in the pipeline, before they are generating electricity.

For 100 years, American utilities have gone to the marketplace to get their approval for building new plants and facilities. With that constraint on overbuilding, we have had a situation where there has been a limit on the situations, as there was in Washington State with nuclear powerplants started and not finished for lack of demand and lack of financing.

If the American people are to be protected, we must pass this legislation again in this Congress and get our colleagues in the Senate to join with us.

The American ratepayers ought not to be prebilled for powerplants that are not yet generating utilities; senior citizens ought not pay for powerplants they may never benefit from and ratepayers in this country deserve a fair hearing that before companies get this kind of assistance, they need to prove some significant financial needs.

I thank the Speaker.

NATIONAL AIRPORT SLOT SALE

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, we all know that nothing succeeds like success and our achievements in deregulating the Nation's airline industry clearly illustrates this truth.

Under deregulation, we have breathed new life into the industry, stimulated new markets, and encouraged healthy price competition among a growing number of airlines.

However, a virtual monopoly still exists at federally owned National Airport. The Government permits an airline scheduling committee to allocate precious landing and takeoff rights.

Not surprisingly, this committee, composed of various airlines, has failed for almost 2 years to agree upon an acceptable allocation scheme, and caused a freezing of rights at National.
